I think when the Senator from Idaho sees that in print he will rather regret it, if he is capable of the emotion I think he is.

But what I wanted to ask the Senator is this: He states that historians tell him that this old man never saw the Confederate seal. I want to ask him the name of that historian, because that is a matter of some historical interest.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator has inadvertently misquoted me as to using the term "historians." I referred to all of the statements that have been written, in newspapers and elsewhere. It appeals to the reason of anyone. What would Mr. Davis be doing with the seal? Do you suppose that Mr. Taft carries the seal of this Government around with him, and that somebody in his employ would know anything about it? I suppose if they had an officer whom they called the secretary of state, he had the seal very likely.

Mr. BAILEY. The statements in the newspapers only make it manifest that there were several copies of that seal because reputable men have declared that they have seen the Confederate seal at times and in places which made it impossible that they had seen the same seal. I think there is no doubt of the fact that there were probably more than half a dozen copies of that seal. But the seal which was used in the executive offices of the Confederate States Government I think is probably the one that was intrusted to the keeping of this negro.

I did not interpose with any view of participating in the discussion as to the resolution, but I understood the Senator from Idaho to say that the historians told him, and I just wanted to get the name of those, because if anybody knows about that I would be glad to learn it from them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have explained what I meant by historians. I suppose newspapers think they are historians. I do not intend to be offensive.

If Senators would refrain from prodding those who feel and appreciate the loyalty that preserved this Union with the bringing up of these questions, they perhaps would be relieved from some plain speech. I have not a sentiment of bitterness in my heart against any man in this Chamber or elsewhere because of the mistakes that he committed in those days. I only object and sometimes resist the attempt to glorify those mistakes. That is all. There is no man bold enough to stand up here and say it was not a mistake to try to destroy this Union. There is no man so bold as that, and why do you bring up these questions time after time, first one thing and another, that you know must stir sentiment? Do you think that the loyal people of the North were devoid of sentiment when they suppressed the rebellion? Do you think they did it for hire? They did it because of their sentiment and they are entitled to consideration for that sentiment.

Mr. President, it is most unfortunate that these questions are brought in. But the responsibility must rest upon those who bring them in. I would not say a word that would be offensive to any Member of this body on that side or wherever he may sit, and I disclaim the intention to be offensive. But I claim the right and the duty to be candid and fair and free in my expressions. I never would raise the question. I never would introduce a resolution or a bill or support a measure that would force such questions upon the attention of this body. They should be forgotten. They should be buried in the past and remain there. This attempt to bring them up every once in a while and glorify them can but have the effect of——

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. BACON addressed the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will finish my sentence. They can but have the effect of stirring up loyal men and women. I believe the Members of this body on that side are loyal now. Whatever their record may have been, I believe they are loyal now. But no one is so foolish as to contend that a man with arms in his hand and a declaration on his part to destroy the Government can be considered loyal to it. Had I participated on that side of the question, I would be glad to have the question buried, rather than to be bringing it up for discussion and exhibition once in a while.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suppose the Senator thought I was through, inasmuch as he was commencing to speak when I was speaking.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I saw him turn around toward his chair, and I thought he was through. When I make a statement of that sort I make it in good faith.

Mr. HEYBURN. I give the Senator credit for that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There has been no resurrection of war feeling or war prejudice or war passion by anybody unless the Senator from Idaho be the resurrectionist. He has indulged in a mild manner of "tearing passion to tatters" about nothing.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator asked me to yield. What for?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What?

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the Senator ask me to yield in order that he might make these respectful remarks?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not ask the Senator from Idaho to yield. I waited until the Senator took his seat, and then took the floor in my own name——

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And in my own right.

I did not refer to the Confederate cause at all, though as the son of a Confederate soldier who very willingly laid down his life for what he, at least, thought was right, I was not prepared to hear a civilized man in the twentieth century call it "an infamous cause." The men who followed Lee and Jackson may have been wrong, though I find them chiefly right, and that the Union is to-day in existence is a cause of congratulation to the children of the men who followed Lee and Jackson. But they were not "infamous." And but for the parliamentary rules that restrain me here I would have a few words to say about the sort of human being in whose heart could exist the idea or from whose lips could flow the utterance that they were "infamous."

Loyalty and courage and honor are things that are precious to honorable men. There never was a war in the world where one side was not partially right and the other partially right and both partially wrong, I suppose. There may have been causes where one was altogether wrong; but a man who takes his life in his hands and lays it down, and lays it down willingly for a cause, whether the Senator from Idaho honors it historically or not, can not be spoken of as having perpetrated an infamy.

I merely referred to the loyalty of this old darky to his master. I merely referred to the fact that in the course of historical evolution the Nation had emancipated his master from the responsibility of taking care of him in his old age, and in the course of historical events, whether emancipated or not, the master would have been so impoverished he could not have done it.

Is it possible that a man can not pay tribute to the quality of loyalty itself, loyalty to a leader, loyalty to a man, loyalty to a friendship, loyalty to a service, as a tribute to him who entertains it without this sort of a diatribe.

The poor old darky set free meets the contempt of the Senator from Idaho, I suppose, when, with the sunlight of freedom all above him, with the atmosphere of freedom all around him, he chose rather to follow his master, his free and voluntary servant without pay and without hope of it at that time, into the darkness of the dungeon cell and to wait on him and give him sympathy while he was being shackled. If his master had been the veriest traitor who ever existed—and he was never tried for treason, mark that!—certainly the loyalty that actuated the darky should be held in honor in any forum, and it ought to be held in honor by anybody.

The Senator from Idaho seems to have appointed himself a voluntary sentinel to see to it that no good word is ever spoken of the men who wore the gray from the years 1861 to 1865.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. There has never been an occasion, as far as I can learn, when he has not gone out of his way, not to rebuke disloyalty, not to rebuke disrespect to the Union, not to rebuke insult to those who wore the blue, but to rebuke the man who dared pay honor to the men who wore the gray——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to yield after a statement like that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do yield, undoubtedly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been associated for years with men who served in the army of the South as officers and privates. They have been my business associates and my warm personal friends. I have stood by them, as they have by me, through life, and I have followed them to a respectful burial. I have on my memory now men whose names would be familiar to the Senator from Mississippi perhaps, who held high office in that army, and we never quarreled about the South because they did not every once in a while bring it out and undertake to make me indorse it. We were content, each of us, to respect the other and allow him to entertain his own views on it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, nobody has been attempting to prevent the Senator from Idaho from "entertaining his own views." The Senator can not shift his ground.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not going to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why bring it out now? Then he says we seek to procure from him an indorsement of our view. That is simply not true. He has not been requested by anybody to indorse that "storm-cradled nation that rose and fell without a stain," that rose greatly and fell greatly and died heroically, nor any of its citizens, soldiers, or leaders. His indorsement is not needful for them.

But that is not the position he has taken. The position that he has taken is that we, the sons of the heroes who followed the Stars and Bars, rightly or wrongly, mistakenly, wisely, or foolishly, for four years, can not say a kind word about them and the things they did; that we can not even pay tribute to the loyalty of their servants without being attacked and being told that we are paying tribute to "an infamous cause." Oh, ye gods and angels in heaven, whence comes the censorship that gives a right to the Senator from Idaho——

Mr. HEYBURN. It comes from the right of an American citizen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To call dead men and their cause infamous?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have the right of an American citizen to love his country and stand up for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is no right in the American citizen to insult the dead. There is no constitutional right given to the American citizen to try to trample upon the feelings of the living, even when he thinks that the reverence that the living are paying to the dead is a mistaken reverence.

Mr. HEYBURN. I said nothing about reverence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can not shift his ground. He spoke of it as "an infamous cause."

Mr. HEYBURN. Was it a glorious cause?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was much of glory in it, and there is no man in the United States—there is not a man on the Senate floor except the Senator from Idaho—who does not know that there was much of glory in it.

Mr. HEYBURN. There were glorious deeds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one moment. There is not a northern historian, a great northern poet, a great northern statesman, and, above all, there is not a great northern soldier who has not paid tribute to the men who followed Jackson and Lee and the Johnstons and laid down their lives for what they thought was the sacred cause of local self-government and national independence.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. I join those men.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But you have a queer way of doing it.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not hear the Chair ask me. I heard what the Senator interposed and I answered his interposition. I do yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well. Then the Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I join the Senator, and I have always joined him in lauding the bravery of the American citizen in whatever army he fought. The individual acts of officers and men for bravery was as great on one side as on the other. It is the principle for which they contended that I condemn. I have no word to say against the bravery and the heroism of the officers and men of the South, and I never have had.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, Mr. President. The Senator from Idaho ought to apply to the Patent Office. He ought to get out a patent upon his newly discovered method of paying tribute to the dead. He ought to get out a patent on his newly discovered method of honoring the feelings of the living who reverence the dead. If to pay a tribute to the loyalty of a darky to his master, first his master under the law and afterwards his voluntarily selected master, be treason in the eyes of the Senator from Idaho, and if "the tribute" that he "pays" of which he has just spoken is that the cause which those men followed is "infamous," then in God's name let him take out a patent. That will not be all. It will never be infringed. I doubt if there is a man in the United States, not only in this great senatorial arena, but I doubt if there is anyone anywhere who will ever attempt to infringe that particular patent. He reminds me of the man who stepped up to the other and said, "Here; I do not mean to be personal, I do not mean to be offensive, but you are a liar, and you are a hypocrite, and you are a nuisance."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to go into this whole discussion again. I do not want to fight the war over again. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I do not want to fight it over, and I hope that no other man will ever want to or have to fight it over again. I should like to see it buried and its memories buried, except as affording a lesson to patriotism and patriotic action.

The Senator need not trouble about my patent way of doing things. I have said that I have no objection to this poor old negro receiving the small compensation which he has been receiving because of the service that he performs. But I should like to ask the Senator, Is he proposing to pension him regardless of the service performed merely because he was a slave to a certain man or to any man? Is that the reason?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not proposing to keep this old darky on the rolls because of the service he is now performing. I could not honestly take that position. From what the Senator from Massachusetts tells me, he is now performing none. From what the Senator from Oklahoma tells me, he may probably soon be able to perform some; but that is merely problematical. I have expressly said that I wanted an exception made out of him because of his character, and in paying tribute to his character I have paid tribute to his loyalty. I have joined Tom Carlyle in the assertion that the most magnificent trait that man or woman can have is loyalty, reverence for something higher, wiser, and better than oneself—loyalty to a cause, loyalty to a country, loyalty to a theory, loyalty to a religion, loyalty to a man. As for myself, I think with Carlyle that the whole world needs the virtue of loyalty very much more than many modern virtues, and that the chief virtue any human has is the virtue of reverence for something higher and better in the opinion of the man entertaining that sentiment of reverence than himself. This I cited in proof of the nobility of this old darky's character; that he had followed his master out of the sunlight of freedom into the darkness of his cell and had served him there; and there is no greater tribute in the world to a man's character than that he has rendered voluntarily an unselfish and loving service to another man.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I conclude——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not yield to the Senator from Idaho any more, because I do not desire any more——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator interrupted me while I was asking him a question. Will the Senator decline to yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will decline, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, because I regret that so much of the discussion has already been deflected from the line of relevancy to the subject matter in hand. I do not want to argue the war over with anybody. I have my ideas about that, and they differ about as far from the ideas of the Senator from Idaho, I suppose, as one pole differs from the other. But this is not the occasion for me either to express them or to defend them. I could not resist, having warm blood in my veins, resenting a reference to the cause for which a very loving and brave and unselfish and patriotic father, who was when he died my father and mother both, who dressed and undressed me and slept with me, laid down his life as an "infamous cause."

Old Jim Jones may be a very humble individual, and though the Senator from Idaho may see nothing of virtue or nobility in his loyalty, in his "resting contented," as he said, "in a state of slavery," I am inclined to think that whenever in the great hereafter—well, I will not say that. Perhaps I had best conclude instead. I have asked merely, Mr. President, that this man be made an exception. That is the ground I put it on. I do not think it follows that everybody else in the United States ought to be made an exception because he is made one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of making a few observations before voting upon the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to amend the resolution.

I have been in public life in this Capitol for nearly 17 years, during which time I have served with many men who fought in the Rebellion against this Government. During all that time, Mr. President, some of which was spent as a member of the Committee on Pensions, I have never known a southern soldier who fought on the side of the Confederacy to object to a pension for a worthy Union soldier. The most eloquent plea I ever heard for a widow's pension was made by the former Senator from Kentucky, Mr. McCreary, a southern soldier, behind committee doors, where it was not for public effect. I have seen the soldiers of the South come to our rescue again and again on this floor when pensions for our Union veterans of the North were involved.

You on the other side are asked to forget the war, forget what you suffered. Why, Mr. President, I would despise a southern man who would ever forget the loyalty and the bravery and the daring and the heroism and the sacrifices their people made in a cause they believed to be right. That is part of the history of our country, written by the sword and attested by the gallantry of our own countrymen on every battlefield in the South.

I think, sir, it is little less than shameful for this side of the Chamber to undertake at this late day to distinguish between applicants, employees, who have been faithful and who now ask for a mere pittance, because of the issues of the war, long since embalmed in sacred memory, which stirred the world by its bravery and its heroism and its daring on both sides of the line as it was never stirred before.

No, Mr. President, I can not find it in my heart to object to the request of the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber that this old colored man shall be pensioned, as it were, by being retained in his obscure position in the Government service, which he has so faithfully filled for the past 30 years. I respect the men who wore the gray; I honor the men who wore the blue. I honor their intrepidity and skill, attested on a hundred battlefields, from Bull Run to Appomattox. Sir, their daring touched the highest mark ever attained in patriotic devotion to country and the valor displayed on both sides is our richest heritage. But, sir, I do not know a soldier in the North who is not broad and generous and catholic, who does not look upon the southern soldier living with kindness and sympathy and upon the Confederate soldier dead with affection and good will. Their loyal devotion to a principle which they themselves thought dear will excite the admiration of all future generations of men the whole world round, and is the proud legacy of the sons and daughters of the Southland.

Sir, those men have cared for their wounded and suffering; they have asked no pensions from the Government against which they rebelled. With a solicitude which we may well emulate, they have bound up their own wounds and nursed their own sick and dying and cared for their dead and rebuilt their devastated States and voluntarily burdened themselves that we might pension our heroes and house them in comfort in their declining years. I think, as I said a moment ago, that it is little less than shameful to object to a simple recognition for an aged negro such as has been asked by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he is under the impression that the committee reported in favor of the abolition of this office because the present holder of it was the body servant of ex-President Davis of the Southern Confederacy?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not know what motive the committee may have had. I assume it was a worthy and honorable one, but I believe that it is a mistaken one, and that if it prevails it will come back to plague not only the committee but this side of the Chamber many times if it withholds this little moiety from a deserving public servant, whose retention is so ardently desired by Senators upon the other side from the South.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan must know very well that the fact that this man was the body servant of Jefferson Davis had nothing whatever to do with the action of the committee. It was all explained in the conference of the Republicans, at which the Senator from Michigan was present, and who voted then and there for adoption of the report of which this is a part.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is a pretty direct statement.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator was present in the caucus. I heard him vote and saw him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a very direct statement, and I want to take issue with it. I never heard of this man until the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] challenged the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, a few days ago, and then this body-guard service developed. I never heard of it before. It was not referred to in the caucus, and would not have received my approval there, as it will not here.

Mr. LODGE. I have seen——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator from Massachusetts goes on I want to say that nobody is more satisfied than I am. I absolutely know the fact that this man held this relationship to Jefferson Davis had nothing under the sun to do with the action of the committee. I know that. That is absolutely certain.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the report which was read to the Republican conference, and this appears on page 3:

James Jones, $720 a year, a laborer formerly in the stationery room. He has not been in the Capitol for two years and his work is being performed by another man.

That was the statement which was read to the Republican conference. I read it just as it stands here. It was adopted by the conference as to Jones, as it was adopted as to Gaskin. Mr. President, I certainly never should have thought of asking for the removal of this old colored man because he had been the body servant of Mr. Davis. He was not a soldier, as the Senator seems to think; he was simply the body servant of the president of the Confederacy.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator did not refer to me, then, when he stated that the Senator seemed to think that?

Mr. LODGE. I did not. I referred to the Senator from Michigan, who appeared to speak of this man as though he were a soldier.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the Senator from Massachusetts misunderstood me. I do not know anything about the military record of this man; and I do not care whether he had a military record or not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have the same feeling in regard to personal loyalty as that expressed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I think it is a noble and most beautiful quality, never more touchingly exhibited than by this poor man, whether in slavery or freedom. Unquestioning, unselfish, unfaltering loyalty is one of the most beautiful, one of the purest emotions of which human nature is capable. It is his blind loyalty which makes the dog dear to man above all other animals. Why, Mr. President, in a novel which we have all read, some of us many times, there is a description of the death of Bill Sykes, the burglar, the ruffian, the murderer, the human brute. When he drops down from the roof of the building and the rope slips over his shoulders and tightens around his neck, his bull dog, an ill-favored, ugly, surly brute, creeps down to the edge of the roof, and seeing his master swinging there at the end of the rope, casts himself after him, and dashes his brains out in the ditch below. I think any man must be devoid of feeling or imagination who, when he reads that description by Dickens, does not have a momentary respect for that poor ill-favored dog, for after all he was loyal to what he alone loved. If we admire this attribute in a dog, how much more must we admire it in a man.

Mr. President, loyalty is a great and noble quality. I should have been surprised if the Senator from Mississippi had not felt about this man exactly as he does; in his place I should have felt in exactly that way myself; but I and those who are on the committee that made this investigation were trying to do our duty to the Senate and to the public as it was presented to us. We went thoroughly into all of these cases, and we found men on the roll who were being paid an annual salary and doing no work. If the Senate chooses to give them a pension, that is for the Senate to say, but no committee had the right to suppress the facts. We brought our report into the conference of the majority party. It was there read; it was discussed for hours; it was voted on; and that portion of the report which I have just quoted remained unamended, unopposed, and went through unanimously.

The committee were doing a hard and disagreeable duty. It seems to me uncalled for to refer to any action of the conference or of Senators as shameful. It demands no great courage to give the public money to those who excite our sympathy. It sometimes requires courage to refuse it. We have done what we thought our duty. I think our action is right, and I think what is proposed is proper as a matter of public accounting; for these reasons the committee has laid the matter before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the parliamentary situation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is the pending question, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. If no Senator desires to discuss the matter further, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to say just a word, Mr. President. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. The peculiar turn which the discussion has taken here this morning I think forbids my stating at length why I shall do so. I want to say, however, before I vote, that I do not record my vote at this time as a vote in favor of a pension. There are reasons why to my mind I should vote for the amendment, some of which have been expressed here by other Senators, and while I shall not go into a discussion of it at this time, I only want it understood that it is not a precedent for establishing a permanent pension roll.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a moment. I was a member of the subcommittee which made the investigation in regard to the work being performed by the employees of the Senate. I am heartily in favor of the resolution being adopted to-day with no changes whatever, not because I am opposed to or have any feeling against Mr. Jones. The fact that he was the bodyguard of Jefferson Davis had nothing whatever to do with my action in this matter. This is a question of business policy, and I can only say that I am in full accord with every word that was uttered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] respecting the pending resolution. We discussed this matter time and time again, and I believe in the object of the resolution, and it ought to be adopted without an amendment.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if I were a member of the organization of the Sons of the Southern Confederacy the first thing that I would do would be to provide for a man like James Jones. I never would allow him to suffer; I would be loyal to the man that was loyal to the President of the Confederacy; I would see that he was taken care of as long as he lived; and if the organization would not do it, I myself, if a member, would do it if it were in my power. My father was a southern man; southern blood is in my veins; he took his slaves to Utah; they were there at the time they were freed; but so long as they lived and remained loyal to him, and after he died the responsibility of seeing that they did not suffer fell upon me, and I assumed that responsibility with all the pleasure possible. It seems to me that it is a poor organization that would allow a man like James Jones to want for a thing. What is $720 a year to a great organization? I would gladly be one to subscribe to a fund to take care of James Jones the balance of his life.

It is not the question of $720 a year that the committee considered. It was the question whether we should continue a policy of carrying men upon the rolls of the Senate when they were doing no work whatever. It is for that reason that I favored the resolution in the first place, and it is for that reason that I shall vote for it at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WATSON (when Mr. CHILTON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). I am requested to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] is unavoidably absent from the Senate in attendance upon a committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON (when Mr. FRYE's name was called). I desire to announce that I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], but I transfer that to my colleague [Mr. TERRELL]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea." I am not informed how the Senator from Maine would vote. I have already voted "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is absent. He has gone to New Hampshire on account of the death of his son. He is paired, I understand, with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], who is detained from the Senate. Believing that if present he would vote "yea" on this question, I shall take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. TAYLOR (when Mr. LEA's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LEA] is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). I am requested by my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] to announce that he has a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present and I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TAYLOR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], who is absent on duty at another place. He would undoubtedly vote "yea" if he were present, and if at liberty to vote I would vote "nay," to sustain the committee.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is detained on the committee examining into the Lorimer matter. I am also requested to say that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is likewise detained on the same committee.

Mr. BACON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. OVERMAN. I am requested to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is absent unavoidably on business of the Senate. I am also requested to announce a general pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON].

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—37.

So the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senate having taken that action, I think it is only justice to the messenger referred to in the resolution, who is also a colored man of nearly 30 years' service here, I believe, or at any rate of very long and faithful service, that he should be excepted and likewise the clerk referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I move, therefore, to strike out the words "clerk, compiling a history of revenue and general appropriation bills, one unemployed messenger and one unemployed laborer," so that the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the offices designated as "superintendent of the folding room," "assistant postmaster and mail carrier," be, and are hereby, abolished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 3, 4, and 5 it is proposed to strike out the words "clerk, compiling a history of revenue and general appropriation bills, one unemployed messenger and one unemployed laborer."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the resolution I send to the desk.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish the Senate a statement showing—

First. What invitations have been received by the United States to attend or be represented in expositions in foreign countries.

Second. What invitations have been accepted in behalf of the United States.

Third. What has been the character of the official representation of the United States at such expositions, whether by commissioners or otherwise; the scope and character of the United States' participation in such expositions, and the amounts expended out of the Treasury of the United States in each case.

And also a statement showing—

First. What invitations have been extended by the United States to foreign countries to attend or participate in or be represented at expositions in the United States.

Second. What foreign countries have accepted such invitations.

Third. What has been the character of the official representation of foreign countries at such expositions in the United States, whether by commissioners or otherwise; the scope and character of the participation by foreign countries in such expositions, and, so far as known to the State Department, the amount expended by each country in each case.

Mr. ROOT. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me understand what the resolution is. I have just entered the Chamber.

Mr. ROOT. It is a call upon the State Department for information regarding international expositions.

Mr. BAILEY. With a view of having another one?

Mr. ROOT. No, sir; with a view to enabling the Committee on Industrial Expositions to act advisedly upon a number of resolutions now before it.

Mr. BAILEY. If this information is desired for the purpose of committing the Government to another exposition, I would object to it.

Mr. ROOT. On the contrary, it is desired, in order that we may deal with this whole subject of expositions as a whole and act with reference to the general course of international conduct in respect to expositions, instead of taking up each case by itself as a local question.

Mr. BAILEY. I am hopeful that when they have all the information they will find that so much of the public money has been wasted that they will help us to call a halt. I very cheerfully consent to the consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection the resolution was considered and agreed to.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask to give notice of an amendment to the rules, and I desire that the notice and the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Notice is hereby given that on Friday, July 14, instant, Mr. BACON will offer an amendment to clause 1 of standing rule 19 of the Senate, by adding thereto the following words, the purpose of said amendment being to secure proper decorum and orderly procedure in the debates of the Senate:

"No Senator having the floor in debate shall permit another Senator to interrupt him without the consent of the Senate, except for the bona fide purpose of asking a question or for the purpose of correcting a misstatement, and not for the purpose of discussion or argument. If any Senator shall interrupt another Senator, except as herein provided, any Senator may call him to order; and when a Senator is thus called to order he shall sit down and not proceed with said interruption without the leave of the Senate, which, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed with said interruption, which motion shall be decided without debate."

Mr. CLAPP. Who is the author of that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has given the notice.

Mr. BACON. I personally am the author of it.

Mr. CLAPP. I just wanted to know if there was any penalty prescribed when a Senator obtained the floor on the statement that he simply wanted to ask a question and then proceeded to make a speech.

Mr. BACON. I do not desire now to discuss it, but I think it is a matter of grave importance. It must be evident to everyone that something must be done to correct what is a great evil and a growing evil. The Senate has ceased to be a debating body. It has gotten so that what are called debates in this body are more like the jowering of unorganized men on the street corner.

I know, Mr. President, it is frequently ungracious to refer to the past, and I know that in saying the past has been better, frequently it is a misstatement. But if anyone will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the past—not the very recent past—he will see the vast difference between the methods pursued by the Senate in former days and in the methods pursued now.

I want to say, in order that I may not be construed as in any manner lecturing, that I myself am one of the chief offenders. I do not attribute any irregularity to others that I do not confess for myself. But in contrast with the RECORD and the method of debate as disclosed by the RECORD of the not very distant past, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-day, if a man will look at it, he will find that the pages of it are more like the pages of animated conversation in some racy novel than they are as pages representing the speeches of Senators.

I do not know that this is a proper remedy. But some remedy ought to be applied. It is not the fault of the Chair. The Chair is active in the effort to preserve the rules. It is the fault of Senators, and there ought to be some method by which, not simply the Senator on the floor who is appealed to to yield to another Senator, but by which any Senator may be permitted or given the opportunity to call to order Senators engaged in that kind of discussion, and the Senate itself shall determine whether or not the procedure which is thus had is a proper one and shall be allowed to continue, or whether the Senator who has the floor shall continue to make his speech. When he gets through let the Senator who has something to say in reply take the floor to reply to it.

I can not offer the amendment to-day. I am only permitted to give the notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be printed and lie upon the table.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment to the bill is that of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. The amendment was not read last night.

Mr. BAILEY. The amendment, in lieu of being read, was printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me the amendment ought to be read so the Senate will know what it is voting on.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I had intended to address the Senate when this amendment was pending. I do not feel in condition to undertake to do it to-day, nor have I felt well for several days.

I will not ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to delay the final disposition of this amendment on my account. It is more important to proceed with the disposition of amendments than it is to hear or to make speeches. Possibly to-morrow, on some other amendment, if this is disposed of to-day, I will undertake to express the views I have as to why Democrats, Democratic Senators particularly, should not vote for such amendments as the pending one when offered to this particular bill. But for the present I am compelled to delay that address, and at the same time, as I have said, I will not ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to delay the consideration of it on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to put into the RECORD the same statement about this amendment that I made about the free-list bill amendment. I regard it as a waste of time to have a roll call on it, because it is apparent that the Senate would vote it down.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer at this time to lie on the table, to be called up later, amendments revising the wool schedule—Schedule K—and also amendments making a revision of the cotton schedule. These amendments cover all the paragraphs of both schedules. I offer them at this time to lie on the table in order that Senators may have an opportunity to examine them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair suggest that the Senator present them to be printed and lie on the table? If he offers them, of course they must be disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not offer them to be voted upon.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if they are presented as separate amendments. I hope they are. I asked that question to ascertain if it is agreeable to him that they may be presented as two separate amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. I will say to the Senator from Texas that they are presented as separate sections to be added to the reciprocity bill, and a division can be called upon them, I would cheerfully acquiesce in a division upon them.

Mr. BAILEY. Would the Senator permit me to volunteer the suggestion that they be printed separately, too, so that any Senator can take one of them without necessarily going over the other, if that can be done?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They are printed separately in the document which I hold in my hand, although bound together. But they might as well be printed that way, and I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas that they be printed as two separate amendments—that is, the amendments which I propose to offer later to Schedule K of the present tariff law and the amendments which I propose to offer to Schedule I of the present tariff law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the proposals will be printed and lie on the table, and printed in separate form.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I will ask, for the convenience of Senators, that they be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, they will also be printed in the RECORD.

The amendments are as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Amend by adding after section 3 the following new section, which shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4. The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule K thereof, being paragraphs 360 to 395, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SCHEDULE K—WOOL AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF.

"360. All wool, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other live animals, shall be divided, for the purposes of this act, into the three following classes:

"361. Class 1, that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, Down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool, or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood and usually known by the terms herein used, and all wools not hereinafter included in class 2.

"362. Class 2, that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

"363. Class 3, that is to say, the hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

"364. The standard samples of all wools which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they shall be needed.

"365. Whenever wools of class 2 shall have been improved by the admixture of merino or English blood, from their present character as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty as class 1.

"366. The duty on wools of the first class shall be 40 per cent ad valorem.

"367. The duty upon wools of class 2 shall be 10 per cent ad valorem.

"368. The duty on wools on the skin shall be as follows: Class 1, 35 per cent ad valorem; class 2, 10 per cent ad valorem; the quantity and value of the wool to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

"369. Top waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, and garnetted waste, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"370. Shoddy, noils, wool extract, yarn waste, thread waste, and all other wastes composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"371. Woolen rags, mungo, and flocks, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"372. Combed wool or tops, and all wools which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this section, 45 per cent ad valorem.

"373. On yarns made wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, the duty shall be 50 per cent ad valorem.

"374. On cloths, knit fabrics, blankets, and flannels for underwear, composed wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, clothing, ready made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls, whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts not woven, and not specially provided for in this section, webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, any of the foregoing made of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, whether containing india rubber or not, 60 per cent ad valorem.

"375. Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; Saxony, Wilton, and Tourney velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; velvet, and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description; printed on the warp or otherwise; treble ingrain, three-ply, and all chain venetian carpets; wool Dutch and two-ply ingrain crapets; carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms; oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs; druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise; all the foregoing, made of wool, or of which wool is the component material of chief value, 40 per cent ad valorem.

"376. Carpets and carpeting of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 40 per cent ad valorem.

"377. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting made wholly of wool or of which wool is the component material of chief value, and not specially provided for in this section, shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpeting of like character or description.

"378. Whenever, in any schedule of this act, the word 'wool' is used in connection with a manufactured article of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool of the sheep, whether manufactured by a woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

"379. All manufacures of hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other like animal, or of which any of the hair mentioned in paragraph 363 form the component material of chief value, shall be subject to a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem.

"Paragraph 583 of the free list of the act of August 5, 1909, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'583. Hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals; hair of horse, cattle, and other like animals, cleaned or uncleaned, drawn or undrawn, but unmanufactured, not specially provided for in this section; and human hair, raw, uncleaned, and not drawn.'"

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Amend by adding after section 3 the following new sections, which shall read as follows:

"SEC. —. The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended by striking out all of Schedule I thereof, being paragraphs 313 to 332, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SCHEDULE I—COTTON MANUFACTURES.

"313. Cotton card laps, roping, sliver, roving, and cotton thread and cotton yarns of all kinds, 20 per cent ad valorem; cotton waste and flocks, manufactured or otherwise advanced in value, 20 per cent ad valorem.

"314. Cloth made of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, not bleached, 20 per cent ad valorem; bleached, 25 per cent ad valorem; dyed, colored, stained, painted, or printed, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"315. The term cotton cloth, or cloth, wherever used in the paragraphs of this schedule, unless otherwise specially provided for, shall be held to include all woven fabrics of cotton in the piece, or cut in lengths, and shall not include any article, finished or unfinished, made from cotton cloth.

"316. Cloth, composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber and silk, or artificial silk, whether known as silk-striped sleeve lining, silk stripes, or otherwise, of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is a component material of chief value, 35 per cent ad valorem.

"317. Handkerchiefs, or mufflers composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, whether in the piece or otherwise, and whether finished or unfinished, hemmed or not hemmed, 30 per cent ad valorem; if embroidered in any manner, or tamboured, appliquéd, or trimmed wholly or in part with lace or with tucking or insertion, 35 per cent ad valorem.

"318. Clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, composed of cotton, or other vegetable fiber, or of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, 35 per cent ad valorem.

"319. Plushes, velvets, velveteens, corduroys, and all pile fabrics, cut or uncut, composed of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, 35 per cent ad valorem.

"320. Laces, lace window curtains, and all other lace articles; napkins, wearing apparel, and all other articles made wholly or in part of lace or laces, or in imitation of lace; nets, nettings, veils, veilings, neck ruffllings, ruchings, tuckings, flutings, quillings, embroideries, trimmings, braids, featherstitch braids, edgings, insertings, flouncings, galloons, gorings, bands, bandings, belts, belting, bindings, cords, ornaments, ribbons, tapes, webs, and webbing; wearing apparel and other articles or fabrics embroidered in any manner, or tamboured, appliquéed, or scalloped, or from which threads have been drawn, cut, or punched to produce openwork, ornamented or embroidered in any manner herein described; hemstitched or tucked flouncings or skirtings; all of the foregoing, composed of cotton or of whfch cotton is the component material of chief value, 35 per cent ad valorem. Belting for machinery made of cotton or other vegetable fiber, or of which cotton or other vegetable fiber is the component material of chief value, 30 per cent ad valorem.

"326. Cotton table damask and manufactures of cotton table damask, or of which cotton table damask is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 35 per cent ad valorem.

"327. All articles made from cotton cloth, whether finished or unfinished, and all manufactures of cotton, or of which cotton is the component material of chief value, not specially provided for in this section, 35 per cent ad valorem.

"328. All artificial or imitation silk or artificial or imitation horsehair, by whatever name known or by whatever process made, and all fabrics and articles composed wholly or in chief value of artificial or imitation silk, or artificial or imitation horsehair, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as like articles or manufactures made of cotton.

"SEC. —. The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended as follows:

"Strike out the word 'cotton' whenever used in Schedule J, entitled 'Schedule J. Flax, Hemp, and Jute, and Manufactures of.'

"Strike out all of paragraph 350.

"Strike out all of paragraph 405.

"SEC. —. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of sections 4, 5, and 6 of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed. The provisions of sections 4, 5, and 6 of this act shall take effect and be in force on and after ———."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have had prepared some comparative tables of duties proposed under Schedules I and K and have had printed as committee prints these comparative schedules. They are in the hands of the Secretary. For the convenience of Senators I will ask that this document be printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 65).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection that order will be entered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, later in the discussion I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to consider more especially the bill in detail. For the present, sir, I submit these two propositions.

First. Considered as a measure of reciprocity, I shall undertake to demonstrate later in the debate that the bill violates every principle of reciprocity heretofore expressed in the platform declarations of the Republican Party and recommended by former Republican Presidents.

Second. Considered as a tariff bill, it violates exery tariff principle and platform promise upon which William H. Taft was elected President of the United States.

In the beginning it was heralded as a blessing to the consumer. So was the tariff bill of 1909. It promises to reduce duties for the benefit of the people. It reduces no duties the effect of which can ever reach the people, but it does reduce duties for the millers, the packers, Standard Oil, the brewers, the coal combines, and in some measure for the already overprotected interests. It is nothing that it pretends to be, and professes to be nothing that it is. It is a little brother to the Payne-Aldrich bill, the greatest legislative wrong inflicted upon the American people in half a century.

While it is important, Mr. President, to the proper discharge of our legislative duties, that there should be maintained between the executive and legislative departments that official comity in the absence of which it is impossible to accomplish the largest measure of public good, yet our binding covenant to represent the public interest compels us, in our legislative capacity, to examine and analyze the recommendations of the Executive with the greatest care and thoroughness at all times. This duty becomes imperative when a President's course has been one of vacillation and contradiction, wanting in steadiness and constancy of purpose and policy.

The pending legislation, based on the Canadian pact, is so important and far-reaching in its consequences, will, in my opinion, ultimately exert under the favored-nation clause of our treaties such an influence upon our trade relations with the great nations of the world, stands so by itself in the exercise of the Executive prerogative, so involves the whole tariff issue, is so related to the strange course of Mr. Taft upon the tariff question and the progressive policies which he was elected to maintain and advance, that the wisdom, the true value, the real, stable worth of his recommendations can not be fairly judged without reviewing the more important issues involved in his election and the more important acts of his administration.

The tariff was the one issue paramount in the presidential contest of 1908. Everywhere, East as well as West, that was the all-absorbing question.

That issue, sir, came with the economic changes in the life of the American people, almost entirely within the decade immediately preceding. Those changes had wrought a revolution in the industrial and commercial conditions of the country. The general business depression following the world-wide financial disturbances in the early nineties prepared the way for the enactment of the high tariff rates written in the Dingley law of 1897. The general suspension of business, unemployed labor, curtailed production in manufacturing were all very generally charged to the lower duties of the Wilson tariff, and the way was open for advancing rates and raising the tariff wall against foreign importations. The avowed purpose of the Dingley law was to exclude foreign-made goods and give to American capital and American labor opportunity to supply the American market.

Mr. President, I have always believed that the statesmanship of that time ought to have been wise enough to discern the gathering forces of trust consolidation, which were then clearly manifest. Indeed, sir, the Dingley rates shut out, in so far as possible, foreign competition. Seizing upon this opportunity, manufacturing combinations of giant proportions immediately formed to suppress domestic competition. Within three years following the enactment of the Dingley law 149 trusts were organized, with a total stock and bond capitalization of $3,784,000,000. Four years later trust control had extended to 8,864 plants, with a total capitalization of $20,379,000,000. By January 1, 1908, the increase in trust consolidation embraced 10,220 plants, with outstanding stocks and bonds aggregating $31,672,000,000 of paper capitalization.

The Dingley law excluded foreign competition. The trusts strangled home competition. The American consumer was completely at the mercy of the over-protected manufacturers of the country. Prices were advanced. The cost of living increased from 40 to 60, 70, and 80 per cent.

The demand for tariff revision was inevitable. It came from almost every home in the land. It increased in volume year by year preceding 1908. Congress was flooded with petitions. Republican county and State conventions adopted resolutions demanding tariff revision. Session after session these appeals were pigeonholed. In Congress after Congress the Committee on Ways and Means was organized to suppress every effort for a revision of the Dingley law. The people demanded a reduction of duty. The trusts resisted, and the answer of Congress to all appeals was, "We stand pat on the present tariff."

But, sir, by the year 1908 standpat Republicans well understood and openly admitted that tariff revision could no longer be resisted. Upon this subject the political situation was acute. Political managers realized that no obscure generalization regarding tariff revision would be safe. If the Republican Party was to succeed in the election of 1908, it was imperative that its platform should declare for tariff revision that would meet the demand in clear and specific terms. Mark what this platform said:

> The Republican Party declares unequivocally for the revision of the tariff by special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President.

This was a promise for revision, not at some future and indefinite time, but, in deference to the demand that could no longer be denied, that convention said to the voters of America: If you will trust us once more, we will revise the tariff, not at some convenient time in the next four years; we will not ask you to wait even until the meeting of the next regular session, but we will hasten with all possible speed and revise the tariff—

> By special session of Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President.

That, Mr. President, was a specific promise for a prompt revision of the tariff.

But, sir, the members of that convention likewise realized that it was vital, in view of the temper of the public upon this question, to be equally definite, clear, and specific in their promise as to the kind of revision that would be insured to the American people if they would elect a Republican President and a Republican Congress.

In what terms did they characterize that revision? I quote from the last Republican national platform. They promised revision—> by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad.

Nothing vague about that. In good, plain Anglo-Saxon they wrote into the platform of 1908 the most precise declaration of the true principle of protection ever recorded by a Republican national convention.

And then, sir, they named William Howard Taft as the man in the Republican Party best qualified to redeem in letter and spirit the solemn promise made to the American people on that June day, 1908.

And Mr. Taft accepted the trust.

Sir, the selection seemed a wise and fitting one.

The candidate went forth to meet the issue and to satisfy the universal demand for tariff revision. From his first utterance it was made clear that the Republican Party would, as its first and highest obligation, if intrusted with power, revise the Dingley tariff rates generally downward, to the end that trusts and combinations which had formed behind the high-tariff wall should no longer find protection in wrongdoing.

In his speech of acceptance July 28, 1908, he said:

> The tariff in a number of the schedules exceeds the difference between the cost of production of such articles abroad and at home, including a reasonable profit to the American producer. The excess over that difference serves no useful purpose, but offers a temptation to those who would monopolize the production and the sale of such articles in this country to profit by the excessive rate.

Day by day, as the campaign progressed, this paramount issue became more and more the dominant and all-prevailing thought in the speeches of the candidate.

Day by day his declaration for downward revision grew stronger and more emphatic.

On September 22, 1908, in his speech at Cincinnati, he said:

> The Dingley tariff has served the country well, but its rates have become generally excessive. They have become generally excessive because conditions have changed since its passage in 1897.

The American people interpreted this to mean that the candidate clearly understood that trust organization had suppressed competition and was controlling prices at will.

And he gave assurance to the voters that the Republican Party would right the wrongs which had grown to be an abuse and a hardship. For in the same speech he said:

> The movement in favor of revision has arisen within the Republican Party and is pressed forward by the Republican Party. The revision which they desire is a revision which will reduce excessive rates and at the same time preserve the industries of the country.

This speech, made in Cincinnati on the 22d day of September, was practically the opening of the campaign. From Cincinnati Mr. Taft proceeded to Chicago and then came directly into Wisconsin.

He made several speeches in Wisconsin, beginning on the morning of the 24th of September. I spent the day with him. He closed with a speech at Milwaukee in the evening. In discussing the tariff, he said:

> The encouragement which industry receives leads to the investment of capital in it, to the training of labor, to the exercise of the inventive faculty, of which the American has so much; and in practically every case in which adequate protection has been given the price of the article has fallen, the difference in the cost of producing the article abroad and here has been reduced, and the necessity for maintaining the tariff at the former rate has ceased.
> I can say that our party is pledged to a genuine revision, and as temporary head of that party and President of the United States, if it be successful in November, I expect to use all the influence that I have by calling immediately a special session and by recommendations to Congress to secure a genuine and honest revision.

He then professed to believe that a genuine and honest revision would result generally in lower tariff rates.

He said most emphatically to that great Milwaukee audience:

> It is my judgment that a revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward, though there probably will be a few exceptions in this regard.

This is what the people positively believed, and it is doubtful if the candidate could have made any other statement which would have so commended him to the confidence of the great mass of the voters of the country.

Mark you, this was at the very outset of his campaign. It was the very first of his all-day speech-making appeal for support. Representatives of every great newspaper in the country were with him, and this statement of his views on tariff revision were carried in the dispatches of every newspaper in the Union.

On the following day, at Des Moines, Iowa, he used exactly the same language, declaring that in his judgment a revision of the tariff "in accordance with the pledge of the Republican Party" would be "on the whole, a substantial revision downward."

As the campaign progressed, the tariff issue increased steadily in importance. From the platform of his special trains as he journeyed from coast to coast, and in the great auditoriums of the country where the thousands thronged to hear him, Mr. Taft emphatically and specifically declared that the "tariff ought to be lowered," that the "Dingley rates have become generally excessive," and that "revision of the tariff in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform" meant "on the whole, a substantial revision downward."

And, Mr. President, upon the pledges of the Republican platform, and his oft-repeated promises as a candidate, William Howard Taft was elected President of the United States by an overwhelming majority.

What, sir, was the meaning of that election as applied to the tariff?

It meant revision downward. But what kind of revision downward? Two plans of revision were presented by the two great political parties in the campaign of 1908. The Republican plan meant revision downward according to the difference in the cost of production between this and competing countries—that is, revision downward along protective lines. The Democratic plan meant revision downward according to the Democratic principle—that is, revision downward to the bare revenue basis.

There is no opportunity for dispute or difference of opinion. The people declared, by an overwhelming majority, their determination that the Dingley duties should be revised everywhere downward until those duties measured the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. Upon that issue they defeated Col. Bryan and elected Mr. Taft.

Let there be no misunderstanding about that fact. The decision of 1908 has never been reversed or modified. I am not unmindful, sir, of the Republican reverses of 1910, when the Republican majority of 47 was changed to a Democratic majority of 68 in the House of Representatives, and the Republican majority of 27 reduced to a majority of 9 in the United States Senate.

But, Mr. President, that did not signify any change of opinion regarding the Democratic Party and its tariff policy of revision downward to a revenue basis. The Democratic Party of 1910 had not changed its position upon the tariff. It stood for a tariff for revenue, just as it stood for a tariff for revenue in 1908, when a majority of the people determined by their ballots against a tariff on the revenue-only basis.

Where there are two great political parties the voter has but one alternative. If he finds himself betrayed by the party which represents the principles in which he believes, he can only resent the abuse of his confidence and register his protest by voting against the public official—the agent of his party—who has violated his trust. The convictions of the voter, to my mind, Mr. President, are as deep and abiding as the convictions of any Member of this body.

The voters in 1908 voted against standpattism. They did more; by their votes they directed their representatives to revise the tariff downward; but, in the interests of the labor of this country, to fix the duties high enough to measure the difference in production cost. And just as emphatically as they voted for such revision they voted against a revision below that point; against revision as expressed in the Democratic platform and represented by Col. Bryan, the Democratic candidate. There was not the slightest foundation for the claim that the elections of 1910 resulted in a Democratic triumph. It was not a Democratic triumph; it was Republican defeat—not a defeat, Mr. President, of Republican principles.

The Republican Party is not composed solely of Republicans who hold office, but of the millions and millions organized around certain ideas, seeking the crystallization of those ideas in legislation through the agents selected by the party and put forward as its candidates for office. A majority of these agents had betrayed their principal; there was but one way for the principal to punish such agents and warn others that they must not transgress in like manner, and that was to vote for the Democratic opponent of the Republican who served the system. That is what the election of 1910 meant.

Mr. President, a platform promise is a covenant with the voter, upon which he stakes his faith and his interests. He gives the party his support; he invests it with his authority; he makes it possible for the party to control in government. The obligation of the party is made the more binding because it seeks out the citizen, urges acceptance of its pledges, presses them upon his consideration, proclaims again and again its purpose to keep them in letter and spirit. The party makes the citizen its solicitor, secures his good offices to repeat its promises, proclaim its principles, and enlist in its ranks his neighbors and friends. Having secured his support, his influence, his vote, the party is in honor bound to keep its pledged word.

But the political party can only execute its contract with the voter and redeem its pledge to the public through the medium of its candidates when elected to office through the will of the majority. Upon the public official, then, as the custodian of the party honor, falls the full weight of the party obligation. He can not play fast and loose with clearly understood party promises and maintain a semblance of official integrity. He has no more moral right to quibble and evade than he would have to squander trust funds committed to his keeping. If this be counted too exact a standard for public service to-day, be sure that it will not be so regarded to-morrow. The citizen is being rapidly enlightened through disappointment and betrayal. He is fast acquiring definite ideas as to the right relation of the political party to government and of the public official to the public service.

President Roosevelt was so strongly intrenched in the confidence and affections of the American people that they were ready to set aside a tradition that has been preserved since the time of Washington—to elect him for a third term as their President. The man whom he chose as his successor was nominated as the candidate of the Republican Party against William Jennings Bryan, the leader of the Democratic Party, easily the second most popular American living, and the contest promised to be a close and exciting one.

It is an interesting study in political psychology to observe the campaign devotion of Mr. Taft to Roosevelt and the Roosevelt policies.

In his speech of acceptance, delivered at Cincinnati on the 22d day of September, Roosevelt, the idol of the American people, seemed to be uppermost in the mind of Candidate Taft. Around Roosevelt and the record of his administration and the progressive ideals which had begun to take the form of settled policies the candidate builded the chief strength of an otherwise ordinary discussion of issues. In one of his tributes to Roosevelt in this speech he said:

> He demonstrated to the people by what he said, by what he recommended to Congress, by what he did, the sincerity of his efforts to command respect for the law, to secure equality of all before the law, and to save the country from the dangers of a plutocratic government, toward which we were fast tending. In this work Mr. Roosevelt had the support and sympathy of the Republican Party, and its chief hope of success in the present controversy must rest on the confidence which the people of the country have in the sincerity of the party's declaration and its platform that it intends to continue his policies.

The speech covers 28 printed pages in the Republican campaign textbook, and in the course of it President Roosevelt and his policies were referred to 26 times. The candidate then had a very clear conception of these progressive policies, and the high favor in which they stood with the American people. In whatever he said, wherever he spoke, in all that he wrote during that campaign period, he kept the militant figure of Roosevelt always in the center of the stage—steadily in the glare of the spot light. The American people were never allowed for one moment to forget that he was the chosen instrument to fulfill the great purposes of the great man who had committed to his hands the work of his administration, finished and unfinished.

The people elected Mr. Taft in the belief that he would hold fast to all that Mr. Roosevelt had gained for the public, sustain his forces in the field, reenforce and support them, revoke no orders, reverse no action, but apply himself to crystallizing into statute law the public opinion, which President Roosevelt organized as a great creative force throughout the land.

On Thursday, December 2, 1909, President Taft's first message on general legislation was presented to Congress and the country. It was a document of 40 printed pages. The man and his policies so often quoted and discussed in Mr. Taft's speech of acceptance and in his addresses during the campaign were twice referred to in this his first message on general legislation. Once he is mentioned as "my predecessor" who directed attention to the "outrageous condition of the workhouse and jail in the District of Columbia"; and once again, where President Taft, realizing the weakness of his position and the necessity of bolstering his advocacy of a doubtful proposition, leans on Roosevelt and says that "following the course of my distinguished predecessor, I earnestly recommend to Congress the consideration and passage of a ship-subsidy bill." That was all. Throughout the 40 pages of his first general message he found no space to say a word for the great measures that had made the name of his predecessor revered and loved everywhere in the United States.

Is it to be wondered at, Mr. President, that the Republican voter in 1910 felt that he had several scores to settle? A President, whom he had elected, believing him to be the custodian of the Roosevelt policies, had dismissed the Roosevelt Cabinet and appointed in their places men, in the main, of known hostility to those policies.

With the promises of Candidate Taft for downward revision still sounding in his ears, he had seen President Taft use all the power of his administration to save from defeat a stand-pat Speaker, who appointed a Committee on Ways and Means in deadly opposition to any revision of the tariff in the interest of the ultimate consumer.

And then he had witnessed that same President on March 16, 1909, transmit his first message to Congress on this all-important subject, a message so brief and so perfunctory that it had no room for an explicit word or suggestion for downward revision of the tariff.

And finally, after having been baffled in his struggle to secure tariff revision by a stand-pat Congress, and after having at last secured the promise of tariff revision downward by a national convention and elected a President and a Congress pledged to such revision, the voter had seen his Representatives in Congress pass and his President sign a tariff bill that increased his burdens and left him even more completely at the mercy of the over-protected trusts and combinations.

But, more than this. So completely had the successor of Roosevelt abandoned the progressive principles committed to his keeping that he had selected as his legislative counselor and guide, and in public speech extolled in the most extravagant terms the patriotism and statesmanship of the greatest opponent of all progressive policies, and hence the greatest champion of privilege in the United States Senate.

Following this he journeyed from coast to coast to speak in defense of standpat Senators and Congressmen, who were the bitterest opponents of the progressive policies of his predecessor, and the very men who were chiefly responsible for revision of the tariff upward.

Then, to still further show his disregard for the great body of progressive Republicans, he proclaimed the Payne-Aldrich monstrosity to be the best tariff bill ever enacted by the Republican Party.

In his acceptance speech, Mr. Taft gave the public distinctly to understand that he favored an income tax. Criticizing the Democratic platform, because it recommended a constitutional amendment providing for an income tax, he said:

> In my judgment, an amendment to the Constitution for an income tax is not necessary. I believe that an income tax * * * can and should be devised which, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, will conform to the Constitution.

He was not talking about a corporation tax, but an income tax as commonly understood, the very income tax pledged in the Democratic platform. He realized that the income tax was popular as a campaign issue, and he led the public to believe that he had a plan through which the tax upon incomes could be levied directly through legislation without waiting for the long delay and uncertainty incident to amending the Constitution, as proposed in the Democratic platform.

He well understood that the people very generally favor a tax upon the individual incomes of the rich, and his suggestion of the possibility of accomplishing this at once through legislation placed him in a position of great advantage on this issue.

In other words, the voter had a right to believe that Taft the lawyer, the judge, was strongly in favor of the income tax and had in mind a feasible plan for the enactment of a constitutional law taxing the individual incomes of the enormously rich, and that by voting for the Republican candidate the country would have the benefit of such a tax as soon as Congress could convene and enact the Taft plan into law.

Mark, now, how completely the voter was misled.

Mr. Taft was elected. The tariff bill came to the Senate. The opportunity was offered to add an amendment to tax individual incomes and resubmit this important question to the Supreme Court, which had decided against such an income tax by only one majority.

Senator CUMMINS proposed an amendment providing for a tax on individual incomes of $5,000 and over. Senator BAILEY proposed another. The two were combined, and votes enough pledged to insure the adoption of the amendment. The proposition to tax individual incomes was so strong with the country that Mr. Aldrich, bitterly opposed to it as he was, could not hold all of his followers in line.

Senators BORAH and CUMMINS had discussed the matter fully with the President. They were assured of the President's sympathy with the amendment, and all progressive Senators, remembering his campaign declaration on this subject, believed that he could be relied upon to stand just where he stood in the campaign.

At last it seemed certain that the enormous wealth in the hands of individuals hitherto escaping taxation would be compelled to pay its just share in support of government.

And then just when the people seemed assured of winning a great victory, the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, without a moment's warning sprung his plan to "tax corporations" as a substitute for the Cummins-Bailey income-tax amendment, and to the utter amazement of the progressives, who had been in conference with and supposed they had the support of the Executive, the Aldrich scheme to substitute the "corporation tax" received the indorsement and approval by a special message of the President of the United States.

A tax on corporations! It was indeed an artful dodge. "Make the corporations pay!" The soulless corporations which had so long exacted excessive profits from the people were at last to be compelled to turn over some of their surplus wealth to support the Government.

Stand-pat Senators with elections pending, who were timid about voting against the income tax, seized upon this opportunity to kill the amendment taxing individual incomes by supporting as a substitute a measure with such a fair-sounding title as a "tax upon corporations." It would be so easy for one when charged with aiding in the defeat of the income tax to answer: "Yes; but I voted to tax the big corporations instead."

These Senators knew what Aldrich and the President knew—that every corporation would add the corporation tax to the fixed charges of the business and exact from the public, through increased rates and prices, every dollar paid as a tax to the Government. Tax corporations indeed! It was an added tax upon the people. It was a tax which the corporations could and did shift to their customers—the public. It was a fit amendment to come from the Senator from Rhode Island. He was always frank and open in support of measures of like character, but what shall be said for the President of the United States, who, in the campaign, has given the voters of this country to understand that he would favor an income tax upon the great wealth of individuals—a tax which once levied upon the individual, after he had received his dividends from Standard Oil, United States Steel, and railroad bonds and stocks, could not then be shifted to the public?

It was, sir, a suitable provision to be coupled with the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. It harmonized with its whole plan. It increased the burdens upon the people. It added betrayal to betrayal.

In all the record of this administration no more glaring example is presented of the complete surrender to special interests and the complete reversal of Roosevelt's progressive policies than that shown in dealing with the amendments to the interstate commerce act. Under the guise of fulfilling party platform promises for the control of overcapitalization, a bill amending the interstate commerce act was drafted in the Department of Justice with the aid of Wall Street attorneys, expert in all the schemes of railroad finance, and made the subject of a special Executive message.

I wish it were possible to acquit the President of any knowledge of the real character of the administration bill for the amendment of the interstate and antitrust laws, as drafted by the Attorney General, for nothing is more damaging in the record of this administration; but the President not only assumed the full responsiblity for the bill as drafted, but made it clear by special message submitted to Congress on the 7th day of January, 1910, that he was well acquainted with all of its provisions, and recommended its enactment into law. He said in that message, after discussing the provisions of the measure in detail:

> By my direction the Attorney General has drafted a bill to carry out these recommendations.

Mr. President, it would have been difficult to have framed a piece of legislation affecting interstate commerce more harmful to the public interest than this bill, drafted by the Attorney General and recommended to Congress by President Taft.

It is fair to say that the bill contained some provisions in the public interest; but they were barely sufficient to veil thinly the true purpose of the measure.

Much credit has been claimed for the administration because the bill, as finally passed, greatly strengthened the interstate commerce law. But, sir, it is time to vindicate the truth. It is time that the country should understand. It will help us to weigh at their true value the recommendations of the Executive on the pending legislation if we review in this connection the record of the administration wherever the interests of privilege are in conflict with the interests of the public.

As President Taft's railroad bill was presented to the Senate it covered 44 pages. It was entitled "A bill to create a Court of Commerce." It was especially heralded as a bill to prevent stock watering and overcapitalization. Like the so-called reciprocity bill, it was a sham and was set before the country under false pretenses and with a false title. The Court of Commerce provision was little more than a mask, behind which, concealed in obscure and devious language, lurked the sinister purposes of the measure. For 12 long weeks in this Chamber progressive Republican Senators and progressive Democratic Senators made war upon the provisions of that bill, which were hostile to the public interest. Through their efforts the bill was reconstructed in the face of strong opposition and continued criticism from the White House. As it was finally enacted it was no longer the President's bill; it no longer bore any resemblance to the measure which came from the hands of his Attorney General. Against all the influence of the great railroad corporations of the country, combined with all the power of the administration, the bill which the Executive had caused to be drawn and which he strongly recommended was, excepting as to the provision for the Commerce Court, which was much improved, literally torn to pieces and rewritten on the floor of the Senate. As drawn by the Attorney General, by direction of the President, the bill contained but four provisions that could be construed as conferring any benefit upon the public. Framed in ambiguous phraseology, it contained 12 provisions written solely in the interests of the railroads, the like of which had never been presented in any legislative body in America. It was the boldest raid upon public rights in the form of legislation that the system had ever found any administration willing to adopt and attempt to foist upon the serious consideration of Congress. Never before had it been attempted with the support of a national administration and of party leaders upon the floors of Congress to fasten forever upon the commerce of the country the public burden of transportation charges to pay interest and dividends upon all the watered stocks and bonds which unrestrained corporate greed had set afloat in the financial channels of this country.

Mr. President, against the opposition of reactionary Senators upon both sides of this Chamber, representing the reactionary administration, progressive Republican and Democratic Senators in reconstructing the rate bill in 1910 on this floor rendered the most conspicuous public service to the American public which it has been my privilege to witness since I have been a Member of this body. Day by day through that protracted struggle of three months they fought their way to one achievement after another, until a dozen bad provisions had been forced out and 19 provisions of vital importance to the public interest had been written into the measure, perfecting it for final passage.

The railway-rate legislation of 1910 was a valuable addition to the Federal legislation for the regulation of interstate commerce. The long contest aroused public sentiment, and it was alert and watchful. The administration could not afford to reject the measure as reconstructed by Congress—and to the credit of Congress it passed into statute law.

The Republican national convention recognized, as it was bound to, the great awakening of the American people on the subject of conservation. The American people had witnessed the appropriation of vast timber resources by private interests. They had seen the anthracite coal supply within the United States, every foot of it, pass into the ownership of a few railroad companies. They had awakened suddenly to a realization that it was the settled policy of the system to grab the water powers wherever found on the public domain. And it had inspired them with new hope and courage when the Roosevelt administration had organized to take back these natural resources held in fraud and to sacredly protect the remnant of this precious heritage for all future time.

I say the Republican convention of 1908 was bound to consider—it could not, if it would, have ignored this great work of the Roosevelt administration. And so we find in its platform, among other things on this subject, the following:

> We indorse the movement inaugurated by the administration for the conservation of natural resources.

The Republican candidate, keenly alive to the campaign value of this issue, said, in his speech of acceptance:

> The preservation of our soil and of our forests, the securing from private appropriation the power in navigable streams, the retention of the undisposed of coal lands of the Government from alienation, all will properly claim from the next administration earnest attention and appropriate legislation.

Such, in part, was the platform declaration of the Republican Party on conservation, and such, sir, was the promise of the presidential candidate.

Mr. President, what is his record of performance?

Under President Roosevelt, James R. Garfield had made a remarkable record as Secretary of the Interior. His department had been reorganized; trained men backed by that able and honest Secretary were everywhere guarding the public domain from further encroachment, and hunting down the agents of the "System" who had fraudulently acquired timber and coal lands and water-power sites subject to entry. Garfield had blocked the old game. So long as he remained at the head of the Interior Department the lucrative practice of stealing timber, coal, oil lands, and water-power sites was dangerous business.

Upon his inauguration, March 4, 1909, the first act of President Taft to redeem his promise on conservation was to dismiss Garfield as Secretary of the Interior and appoint in his place Richard Achilles Ballinger. The shock of this change was partially softened by the retention of Gifford Pinchot as Chief Forester.

Mark what followed:

April 30, 1909, in fulfillment of Mr. Taft's promise in his speech of acceptance "to secure from private appropriation the power in navigable streams," Garfield's successor, Secretary Ballinger, began the reversal of the Roosevelt policies by opening to entry 5,000,000 acres of the public domain bordering on or contiguous to navigable streams. Pinchot protested, and certain of those lands were again withdrawn. Ballinger was forced to modify his first order, but not until an opportunity had been given the water-power magnates to get in on the ground.

August 12 Washington correspondents foreshadowed to the country that Ballinger was making plans looking toward Pinchot's ultimate removal.

August 20 Washington correspondents warned the country that the interests were organizing against Pinchot.

August 26 the country was startled by the report that Louis R. Glavis, special investigator in the field, had filed with President Taft a statement disclosing that a monster conspiracy had consummated the seizure of extensive anthracite coal fields in Alaska.

September 5 Ballinger, having announced that he would begin "killing snakes," left Washington for Beverly, Mass., to confer with President Taft regarding the Cunningham and other Alaskan coal-land claims.

September 16 President Taft made public a letter to Ballinger, fully exonerating him and upholding him in the controversy with Pinchot and Glavis. On the same day he dismissed Glavis from the public service.

November 12 Washington correspondents announced that Ballinger, in conference with Mr. Taft, demands Pinchot's head.

December 21 the President's letter of September 16, exonerating Ballinger, having failed to convince the public and having been generally characterized as an "Executive whitewash," the administration resorted to a congressional investigation to vindicate Ballinger, and on December 21 Congress ordered such an investigation.

On the night of January 7, 1910, President Taft dismissed Gifford Pinchot as Chief Forester.

Pinchot had unselfishly devoted himself to the public service. With a foresight that was the genius of constructive work, he had wrought out the great plan for the reclamation and conservation of the natural resources of the country. He had been in advance of all others in fighting waste through neglect and destruction and loss through pillage and plunder of the national wealth belonging to this and future generations. He had gathered about him able, earnest, and enthusiastic young men and raised them and the Forest Service to the same high ideals.

Of Gifford Pinchot and the nine years he had devoted to this service President Roosevelt, on June 10, 1907, said:

> We are doing everything in our power to prevent fraud upon the public lands. * * * So much for what we are trying to do in utilizing our public lands for the public in securing the use of water, oil, coal, and timber for the public. In all four movements my chief adviser, and the man first to suggest to me the courses which have actually proved so beneficial, was Mr. Gifford Pinchot, Chief of the Forest Service.

Again, President Roosevelt said in his opening speech to the conference of governors at the White House, May 13, 1908:

> Especial credit is due to the initiative, the energy, the devotion to duty, and the foresightedness of Gifford Pinchot, to whom we owe so much of the progress we have already made in handling this matter of the coordination and conservation of natural resources. If it had not been for him, this convention never would nor could have been called.

The congressional investigation of the Alaskan coal scandal resulted in many startling revelations. It confirmed the public opinion, which had early reached the stage of conviction, that Ballinger was using his official power to aid the Morgan-Guggenheim interests in wrongfully acquiring control of the Alaskan coal fields.

For weeks before the close of the investigation it was manifest that important disclosures would be forthcoming, but no one was quite prepared for the shocking discoveries finally made.

It was proven that the President's letter exonerating Ballinger and dismissing Glavis was not, in fact, written by the President, but was prepared under the direction of, and approved by, Ballinger himself and then signed by the President. It was proven further that the letter of Attorney General Wickersham upon which the President stated he had based his decision was not written by Wickersham until two months after the President's decision had been rendered and given to the public, and that it was then prepared and dated back in order that it might be made to appear as the opinion of the Attorney General upon which the President had based his decision in the matter.

These facts were established beyond contradiction and finally admitted in the closing days of the congressional investigation. No act of any President ever caused the American people greater regret and mortification for the unfortunate position in which their Chief Magistrate had placed himself. The testimony in the Ballinger case was closed. There was nothing further to add to the facts proven.

The subsequent history of the Alaskan coal-lands scandal simply confirms the bad faith and betrayal of public interest which the earlier testimony so clearly established.

Following the disastrous failure of the administration's case before the Ballinger investigating committee, the public awaited the decision in the Cunningham claims. Month after month passed. The delay was unaccountable.

In the light of recent disclosures all of the facts as they transpired are worthy of being entered on the record.

October 28, 1910, is now known to be an eventful day in the history of the Alaskan case, as will hereafter appear. The public did not know that fact at the time, because what transpired on that day was kept under cover by the administration for many months.

But to proceed with the facts in order as they became known to the public.

November, 1910, Secretary Ballinger publicly declared his intention of recommending that a special act of Congress should be passed, taking the Cunningham claims out of the hands of the President and turning them over to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

January 9, 1911, a bill was introduced to transfer the decision of the Cunningham claims to the courts.

No action was taken by Congress upon this bill to relieve the administration of the responsibility of deciding the Cunningham claims.

The failure of the administration to take action in the Cunningham claims became a subject of public concern. The Interior Department was as silent as the tomb. The country never suspected that anything involving the future of the Alaskan coal lands was quietly finding its way into the records of the General Land Office.

March 3, 1911, came the threat of Democratic congressional investigation into the Department of the Interior and the impeachment of Ballinger.

March 7 Ballinger resigned as Secretary of the Interior. He took with him to private life the highest encomiums of President Taft upon his patriotic devotion to public duty. Walter L. Fisher was appointed as his successor.

June 27, 1911, Fred Dennett, United States Land Commissioner, announced his decision, holding that the Cunningham coal-land claims were fraudulent.

While the Interior Department was withholding its decision in the Cunningham claims, parties interested in the Alaskan coal fields were active.

Baffled in acquiring the ownership of the coal lands, those in interest planned to secure control of the water front commanding approach and access to the coal lands.

President Roosevelt, fully realizing the importance of this water front to the public, upon discovery of the preliminary moves by R. S. Ryan and the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate to acquire it, on February 23, 1909, placed it beyond the reach of the land-grabbers by proclamation including it in the Chugach National Forest.

On the 20th of April, 1911, the country was shocked to learn that on the 28th of October, 1910, President Taft had signed an Executive order, reversing the action of President Roosevelt, and throwing open 12,800 acres of land, covering the water front of Controller Bay, the only available natural harbor affording an approach to the coal fields in which were located the fraudulent Cunningham claims.

It was the usual practice of President Roosevelt and of other Presidents, whenever they restored public land to entry and sale, to do so by proclamation, not by Executive order, and to include in such proclamation a provision that the land thus restored to entry and sale should not be subject to entry for 60 days after the date of proclamation restoring it to entry, thus giving ample public notice to all people who might desire to file on such lands.

These Executive precedents were violated in reversing Roosevelt's order and restoring the Controller Bay lands to private entry. This the President did by secret Executive order and not by proclamation.

Mr. Fred Dennett, Commissioner of the General Land Office, testified July 10, 1911, before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior that the Executive order, as originally prepared for the President's signature, contained the usual 60-day notice to prospective settlers, but was omitted from the Executive order when finally signed by the President.

An Executive order is not necessarily published. A proclamation is. An Executive order restoring land to entry is merely transmitted to the land offices and to the heads of various bureaus. In this case the Executive order was issued October 28, 1910. It was not made public. It was five days thereafter before it was put in the mails to be transmitted to the land office at Juneau, Alaska.

This is what was being done in Washington. Turn now to Alaska.

It is now known that on the very day the order was mailed in Washington James J. Ryan, a brother of Richard Ryan, with dummy entrymen, went upon and began a survey of the lands fronting on Controller Bay and filed upon the particular water front which commands practically the one approach, and hence, in effect, constitutes the key to the coal fields in which were located the Cunningham claims.

That he knew in advance that there was a scheme afoot here in Washington to withdraw the Controller Bay lands from the forest reserve and throw them open to entry, that he was advised step by step as the scheme was consummated, and received advice direct from Washington the very day the President signed the order, seems beyond question. The nearest telegraph station is 100 miles from Controller Bay. James J. Ryan must have had all preparations made, his surveyors engaged and in waiting and ready to move when the word came from Washington.

Why the President did not issue a proclamation and make his release of these lands public remains a mystery.

Why there was omitted from his order opening these lands to entry the 60-day provision, within which no filing could be made upon these lands, is not known.

How James J. Ryan secured information far enough in advance to enable him to be on the ground at Controller Bay ready to enter upon those lands as soon as the order was signed may appear later.

Just what may be the relation, if any, of Dick Ryan and James J. Ryan to the Morgan-Guggenheim interests, the real parties back of the Cunningham conspiracy, will doubtless ultimately be proven.

How the President was induced to reverse, set aside, and annul the action of his predecessor, and that, too, by a course of proceeding which excluded the public and opened the way for favored parties to get possession of this strategic position at Controller Bay, may never be known.

Whether the protracted delay of the Cunningham decision had any relation to the successful grabbing of the Controller Bay lands may appear when all the facts have been uncovered by the investigation.

But, Mr. President, there is absolutely no doubt that parties to the coal-land frauds well knew that, next to securing the Cunningham claims, title to the lands on Controller Bay would place them in a commanding position over all the coal fields in question.

Heir to the Roosevelt policies, as a presidential candidate Mr. Taft was a pronounced progressive and the leading and most enthusiastic Roosevelt champion from the first to the last day of the campaign.

Three months before he was inaugurated Roosevelt's Cabinet seemed certain of being retained by Taft. Three months after he was inaugurated he seemed to have forgotten that there ever had been any well-known Roosevelt policies.

He had no sooner taken his oath of office than he sacrificed the progressive cause for the support of Aldrich and Cannon and their reactionary program.

Rebuked at the polls in the election of 1910, he foolishly tried to buy back with post-office appointments the support of the progressives in Congress, which he had lost when he abandoned progressive policies.

In the same spirit he is now seeking to regain the lost confidence of the public by Cabinet changes, in the hope that the people will forget.

The President's course has been vacillating and without definite policy because, apparently, there has been throughout his administration no deep conviction other than the hour makes appear expedient.

His conduct of the pending legislation is of the same kind and quality as that which has marked his whole course as President. Reciprocity is a popular catchword. The President seized upon it.

He made an Executive compact the basis not of a reciprocity treaty but of a tariff bill. Upon this false basis he seeks to force it through Congress without amendment or change.

As a treaty it should have come to the Senate for ratification.

As a tariff bill it should have been considered by the House and Senate with due regard to every industry affected and subject to whatever amendment is required to make it fair and just legislation.

It was thrust upon the last Congress at the close of a short session, when there was absolutely no time for its consideration, followed with the threat of an extra session if it were not jammed through, in obedience to Executive orders.

And now we are again threatened that any amendment of this tariff legislation, any attempt to so change this measure as to make it in some degree more just and equitable, will be met with Executive veto.

Sir, in letter and spirit this measure violates every principle and every promise of the Republican platform, express or implied, and every printed or spoken word and inducement employed to secure the votes necessary to elect William H. Taft President of the United States.

This bill and the Canadian pact upon which it is based are cruelly unjust to 33,000,000 people engaged in and dependent upon agriculture. They are fighting for simple justice, with their backs to the wall. In such a warfare they are entitled to employ every legitimate weapon.

And for whose benefit is agriculture to suffer? Ah, sir, the real beneficiaries are coming into view a little more clearly day by day. Since the President's admission at Indianapolis July 4 that this bill promises nothing for the consumer, the real parties to profit are beginning to be a little more clearly distinguishable. They are all-powerful; call the roll.

Joined with the Executive to force this bill through Congress are the newspapers, having a real grievance and frankly admitting their selfish interest, amounting to many millions of dollars; the railroads; the overprotected manufacturers; and practically every trust and combination backed by Morgan and Morgan influences.

The President allied himself with these same interests in the tariff legislation of 1909; with these same interests when he defeated the tax on individual incomes that session; with these same interests when he proposed and attempted to force through Congress the railway rate bill in 1910; with these same interests in the long and heart-sickening affair in Alaska, the end of which no man knoweth; and with the power greater than all back of these same interests, when he, on June 22, at a meeting of the New York State Bankers' Association, openly announced his support of the Aldrich-Morgan credit-controlling monopoly of all monopolies.

Mr. President, I have reviewed the record of this administration to no good purpose if I have not made it plain that the great issue for which Roosevelt appealed to the public conscience, for which the progressives have been fighting for years, is not the tariff, not railway regulation, not conservation. It is these; but, O sir, it is more than all these combined. It is for justice, eternal and everlasting justice, for every human being against organized selfishness and power.

I will have no quarrel with men. I attack no individual. But, sir, no eminence of position in any party or in government shall protect from deserved criticism the bad record of any public servant.

If we who oppose this legislation were seeking the easier way in public life, with the newspapers arrayed so generally in support of it, we should have quietly acquiesced. But, sir, I have never sought the easy way. Against every attempt to strengthen and entrench special interests, in whatever form it is presented, whether it be a winning or a losing fight, I shall oppose it to the end.

And so I say regarding this bill. No man should mistake the true meaning of the contest involved. It is more than a question of tariff rates. It is bigger than a mere opportunity for party advantage. It is the fight between the plain people and confederated privilege.

Mr. President, I shall on another day address myself more particularly to the provisions of this bill and to the amendments which I shall submit to be incorporated in it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to the pending bill, but before offering the amendment I desire to submit a few general observations upon the measure.

This Canadian bill takes the tariff off of the articles that are not controlled by trusts, and retains the tariff on the articles that are. It removes the duties from the commodities the price of which has never been materially advanced because of such duties and retains them on the articles the prices of which have been increased to the American consumer by the duties. It puts the products of the American farmer on the free list and gives the trusts and combinations, to which he sells his products, the benefit of a high protective duty. It makes the American farmer sell his own products in his own home market in free competition with the Canadian, his great competitor, and refuses to permit that farmer to buy the things which he must have in the freer market which his competitor enjoys. With the exception of the newspapers, which will get free print paper, and the northern railroads that will haul Canadian products into our markets, the interests that receive the greatest benefit from this Canadian agreement are the Meat Trust, the brewers, and the northern millers. These industries are given free raw material, and high duties are still retained on the articles they make from these free raw materials. The packers get free cattle and retain a high duty on dressed meats. The brewer gets free barley and retains a protective duty on the product of his breweries. The miller gets free wheat and still retains his protective duty on flour. The Linseed Oil Trust gets free flaxseed and retains the duty on its linseed oil. The profits of all these concerns are thereby enhanced at the expense of the American farmer, but the price of their manufactured products is not reduced to the American consumer.

The President has said upon various occasions that the treaty would not reduce the price of the farmer's products and that it would decrease the cost of living. A statement coming from the President of the United States is accepted by many people without hesitation as true. The people are loath to scrutinize it with the critical care that they would if it came from a less exalted source. They can not realize that a man holding that high office would utter an absurdity. And while the President, in his Indianapolis speech, modified his former statements, he has never explained how it is that the cost of flour and meat is to be reduced by taking the tariff off of wheat and cattle without reducing the price of the wheat and cattle.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the Senator from Kansas quite sure of his quotation from the President? As I have understood the President's remarks, and I have tried to keep pace with them, he said "the immediate effect of the passage of the reciprocity bill will not be to reduce the cost of living."

Mr. BRISTOW. That was his statement in the Indianapolis speech.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have read that statement many times.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is not my recollection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I may be wrong about it. I suppose the Senator from Kansas has examined the matter carefully.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; I have. If the President had stated that this agreement of his would reduce the price of the farmer's products, but would not decrease the cost of living, his statement would have been more nearly correct. This legislation will to some extent, in my opinion, reduce the price of the farmer's wheat, but will not reduce the price of the flour which the American consumer buys. It will reduce the price of the barley which the farmer sells to the brewers, and will add that much more to the brewers' profits. It may reduce the price which the packers pay for cattle, but it will not reduce a penny a hundred the price which the consumer pays for the meat that he buys from the packer. The only conclusion that anyone can form from the provisions of this bill is that it is intended to reduce the price that the packer and the brewer and the miller pay to the farmer for the products of his farm, but is not intended to reduce the price of the commodities that the packer, brewer, and miller sell to the American consumer. This is the only intelligent conclusion that can be drawn from the bill.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a quorum of the Senate to listen to this speech. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Borah	Curtis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Dixon	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Briggs	Gore	Nixon	Smoot
Bristow	Gronna	Oliver	Sutherland
Brown	Heyburn	Overman	Swanson
Burnham	La Follette	Page	Taylor
Clapp	Lippitt	Penrose	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Perkins	Watson
Crane	McCumber	Pomerene	Williams
Culberson	McLean	Rayner	Works
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Root

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is away for the reasons I have already stated, and I wish this announcement to continue for the present.

Mr. PAGE. I again announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent from the Chamber attending the Lorimer investigation. I was also requested to state that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is absent from the Chamber for the same reason.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not my purpose to make an elaborate speech upon the general phases of this proposition. The RECORD has been filled with unanswerable arguments by the Senators from North Dakota and South Dakota and Minnesota; by Mr. BORAH, of Idaho; Mr. CUMMINS, of Iowa; and others. These arguments have not been answered, and I shall not undertake to go over the ground that they have so completely covered. I will not support this bill as it is, because as a revision of the tariff it is a deception and a fraud, as a revenue measure it is a failure, and as a free-trade proposition it is neither equitable nor just. This measure maintains the indefensible duties on certain manufactured articles that were provided in the Payne-Aldrich bill. The purpose, doubtless, of its authors is to satisfy, temporarily at least, the demand of the public for a tariff revision by taking the duties off farm products, though the American people have never complained of those duties, and to leave the great manufacturers, who are the principal beneficiaries not only of the high tariff duties but also of these reductions, to enjoy still the high rates that they now have. If this had been an honest effort to relieve the American people from the burdens of excessive tariff taxation, the high duties on trust-controlled products would have been first attacked. But the Sugar Trust, the American Woolen Co., the Steel Trust, the Smelters' Trust, the Rubber Trust, and all of these great concerns that have monopolized the American market and used high protective duties to charge excessive prices to the American people, are left untouched, while the President of the United States and the Democratic majority in both branches of Congress have joined in an attack on the duties of the agricultural schedule—duties that have never been a burden to the American people because they have never greatly increased the price of the products upon which they were imposed. Democratic leaders have for half a century made violent attacks on the duties that protect the "manufacturing barons" of the East, but now when they have an opportunity to relieve the people of the burdens of which they have so bitterly complained, they refuse to do it. The combination on this floor between certain standpat Republicans representing great manufacturing States and a majority of the Democrats has, we are told, decided that no amendments shall be attached to this Canadian bill, and that soon after it is passed Congress is to adjourn. This combination is to visit its wrath on the farmer and give the trusts a chance to escape any immediate disturbance. If the plan succeeds, the standpatters save their high duties on manufactured articles, the President gets even with the insurgent farmer of the West and makes friends with the newspapers—a friendship which he has sorely needed during the last two years—and the Democrats are given an issue for the campaign next year, which is the thing they most desire. They will point with pride to the record which the House has made; and, incidentally, this proud record of the House may call favorable attention to the qualifications of its Speaker for the Presidency. Against this combination I protest with all the vehemence I can command. It ought not to succeed. Some good men have been drawn into this net. They ought to get out of it. Now is the time to secure some sound, wholesome tariff legislation; and if the Democratic Members of this body are more interested in securing such legislation than in preserving a campaign issue, we will get it. But I fear they are not. The Washington Times on July 10 said:

[From the Washington Times, July 10, 1911.]

TAFT PASSES WORD HE WILL USE VETO—PRESIDENT MAKES IT KNOWN HE WILL SEND BACK ALL BILLS EXCEPT RECIPROCITY.

President Taft has sent word to the Senate that he will veto such separate schedule bills as the Senate may pass this session after it passes the reciprocity agreement.

The President has communicated this to some of the leading Senators on the regular side. The statement that he was taking this position in his talks with leading regulars was made to-day by one of the foremost of the regular Senators.

This statement may be true. You will observe, however, that the article says the President will veto "such separate bills." He does not say, and he never has said, that he would veto his reciprocity bill if it also reduced duties that ought to be taken off of other articles, such as sugar, woolens, and cottons. Yet the only excuse that has been offered for a refusal to amend this bill is that if any amendment, regardless of its merits, is attached to the bill Mr. Taft will veto it. I do not believe the statement, but do believe it is put forth here as an excuse to prevent legislation and thereby preserve the very desirable campaign issue of the tariff. And I predict, now, that as soon as this bill is out of the way there will be some very skillful jockeying to fix the responsibility for the failure of the legislation which our Democratic friends claim so much to desire and which their standpat associates are assured will not be consummated. I await with interest the maneuvers of the allied forces that are now preventing effective reductions of burdensome duties by refusing to amend this bill. The standpatters will be entirely willing for "separate bills" to pass provided there are provisions in them upon which the President can with some consistency base a veto, while their Democratic allies will see that such provisions are in the bills that may pass. I sincerely hope that this conspiracy against desirable legislation will fail. The most likely means of preventing it will be the giving of sufficient publicity to the plan.

Reciprocity is a popular phrase with the American people. The tariff policy which bears that name was first given a prominent place in our political affairs by the late James G. Blaine, and William McKinley also added much to its popularity. Little did these great men dream that this term which they popularized would be used as a weapon by a Republican President to destroy the protective policy to the success of which they had contributed so much. The reciprocity which Blaine and McKinley advocated sought to enlarge the markets for the surplus products of the American farm as well as the American factory, and not to throw open the American markets to the foreign farmer without any compensation whatever. The original idea of reciprocity was that we should open our markets upon favorable terms to noncompetitive articles, in order that we might secure advantageous markets for our surplus with the contracting country. To find markets for our productive energies was the purpose of the fathers of the reciprocity idea. Blaine and McKinley were stanch protectionists. They sought to develop the latent resources of our country. To bring into activity our dormant wealth, high duties were placed on the importation of manufactured articles which could be successfully produced by our own people. To encourage the development of our industries, to bring into activity our latent resources, has been the great purpose of the protective policy.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that we either ought to have a quorum here or we should adjourn. I shall either move an adjournment or ask for a quorum. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. DIXON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. TERRELL] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] is unavoidably absent on public business, as is also the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. BORAH. I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I understand that if he were here he would vote "nay," so I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that my colleague, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], is engaged in the Lorimer investigation, and is therefore necessarily absent.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, while it is true, as I have stated, that I have a pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], I think in this instance his vote would be the same as mine. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 7, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—7.

Bourne	Dixon	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Gronna	Nelson

NAYS—42.

Bacon	Gore	Oliver	Smoot
Borah	Guggenheim	Overman	Sutherland
Briggs	Heyburn	Page	Swanson
Brown	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Taylor
Burnham	La Follette	Perkins	Townsend
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Poindexter	Warren
Crane	Lodge	Pomerene	Watson
Culberson	McLean	Rayner	Wetmore
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Reed	Williams
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Root
Curtis	Nixon	Shively

NOT VOTING—42.

Bailey	Davis	Kenyon	Simmons
Bankhead	Dillingham	Kern	Smith, Md.
Bradley	du Pont	Lea	Smith, S. C.
Bandegee	Fletcher	Lorimer	Stephenson
Bryan	Foster	Myers	Stone
Burton	Frye	Newlands	Terrell
Chilton	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Thornton
Clapp	Gamble	Owen	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Paynter	Works
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Percy
Crawford	Jones	Richardson

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, during all the years of our history, the believers in protection have argued with the American farmer that it was to his interest to sustain that policy, because the development of our industrial life and the building up of our manufacturing enterprises would create for him a home market for the products of his farm; and while he was not getting a direct material advantage from protection, he would secure a better price for his products by the creation of a home market. It was pointed out to him that he would not then have to depend upon a foreign market for the sale of his surplus, but would have a market of his own close at hand. This argument has had great weight with the American farmer, and he has been the stanch supporter of the protective tariff. And in this I believe he has been wise. I am a believer in the policy of protection. I have frequently said, and I say now without hesitation, that in my judgment the protective tariff has contributed more to our material prosperity than any other policy our Government has ever adopted. Under its influence our industries have developed with marvelous and unprecedented rapidity. In material progress we are 50 years ahead of what we would have been if protection had not been our national policy. Its success has been due largely to the loyal support of the American farmer, and now, when the market that he has helped create is at hand, it is proposed by those who have been the direct beneficiaries of the protective system to turn that market over to the Canadian. They take from the farmer that which he has helped to create, and which has been held up to him as his future hope and reward, and turn it over to the foreigner. They not only rob him of his rights, but do so with an insulting insolence. There never has been an illustration of grosser political perfidy. I for one will not be a party to it. I am a Republican, and I still believe in protection; but while I believe in the protective tariff, I protest against that policy being made the handmaiden of greed and avarice. And it is a source of great pride to me that when, through the greed and selfishness of men, this great party policy began to be used as a means of promoting monopoly and imposing upon the American people excessive prices for the necessaries of life, the Republican Party, in its national convention, met its responsibility by a new declaration on the tariff question, namely:

> In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

I believe that to be the wisest declaration ever set forth by a national convention on the tariff question. It preserves and maintains the protective system as advocated by Hamilton, Clay, Lincoln, Blaine, and McKinley, and it will also protect the American people from the extortion of monopoly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply desire to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that when we were preparing the last tariff law a great deal of anxiety was expressed in this Chamber over certain reports that were made by boards of trade and chambers of commerce in Europe bearing upon the wages of the workingmen in the factories and on the farms of Europe and the cost and manner of their living. I have looked over these reports very carefully, and I find that in almost every instance the boards of trade of Germany have said that the manner of living and the standard of living of the American workingman was very much superior to the standard of living of the German in his own home, and that that element should also be considered upon the question of fixing our tariff duties.

Mr. BRISTOW. That would necessarily be covered by the wages, for if the American laborer did not get better wages than the German he could not live better than the German. He must necessarily have more pay. So that element of the cost of production is taken into consideration, and was covered by the Republican national platform declaration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I suppose it is a part of the political creed of the Senator from Kansas that that high standard of living should be maintained?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that is not equaled by any people on the face of the globe.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; and that is the reason I am a protectionist.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to learn whether the Senator thinks that he should be bound by his own definition? We will suppose that an article can be produced in this country just as cheaply as it can be produced in China. Would the Senator say, then, that if the cost of production should be the same in each country the article should come in free?

Mr. BRISTOW. But the element of revenue would come in then, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; I am speaking of——

Mr. BRISTOW. But if the cost of production, considering the American standard of wages, as suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], is more here than in other countries, I think that difference in the cost should be covered by a protective duty. If the cost is no greater here because of the superior efficiency of American workmen or superior advantages due to machinery, and so forth, then that industry needs no protective tariff, and the question of a customs tax for revenue is the only one to be considered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us suppose that the cost of producing an article is 100 cents in this country and the actual cost of producing it is 100 cents in China; that the American standard of living requires a profit of 10 cents upon the production of that article that it may be maintained, while the standard of living in China requires only a profit of 1 cent; then the Senator must see and must admit that his standard would not be just in all respects; otherwise we would be forced to the same standard of living that the Chinaman is satisfied with, if we adopted the Senator's rule. Is it not a much better rule to say that the protective tariff should be one that simply protects, that is sufficiently high to give a reasonable profit, and one that is sufficiently low to prevent an exorbitant or excessive charge to the consumer? When we take that as a standard, rather than the cost of production, we have something that we can all understand, and we have something that is applicable to our conditions and which is just and fair.

I want to say to the Senator that I, as a Republican and as a protectionist, have never agreed to that part of the Republican platform, which has been several times referred to here as the standard of Republicanism, that the measure of protection in every instance should be the difference in the cost of producing an article at home and abroad without reference to reasonable profits.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will read that part of the platform again. I think the Senator from North Dakota has forgotten one of the provisions in the national platform which I indorse.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, plus a reasonable profit?

Mr. BRISTOW. The part with reference to a reasonable profit to American industries. I indorse that provision. That provision has been criticized by tariff revisionists as being unnecessary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Pardon me; the reason that I brought that out was that there are some fairly good Republicans who repudiate the added provision, and I am glad that the Senator agrees with me upon the necessity of that added provision, which recognizes the propriety of maintaining our higher standard of living.

Mr. BRISTOW. And I believe that every industry should have a fair opportunity to thrive and flourish in this country of ours; but I do not believe that any of our laws should operate so as to put that industry in the hands of a few people who can combine and charge excessive and exorbitant prices for their products to the consumer.

I can understand that there may be instances where this rule can not be applied, but in the assertion of a general principle you can not take into consideration every incident that might arise in framing a law under that general principle. It is well known that I am in favor of free lumber. You can not, according to my theory, apply this principle to the lumber production, for the reason—and I think the Senator from North Dakota and myself will agree on this, although many of our associates may disagree with us—that the raw material from which lumber is made is becoming very scarce and ultimately will be exhausted in this country of ours.

Mr. McCUMBER. It will be exhausted.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, exhausted; and to prevent the exhaustion of that raw material which can not be reproduced, I believe it ought to be conserved, and, therefore, I think that lumber should be made an exception to the rule. There will be differences of opinion among protectionists as to what exceptions should be made, as there are such differences now, but there should be no differences of opinion as to the soundness of the principle.

I think that plank in our platform the best guide that has ever been set up by a political party in the history of this Republic for the fixing of tariff duties.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to say that I think that that declaration at Chicago pleased all the critics of the protective policy and displeased all of those who feel that the policy is essential to the welfare of our country. I always regretted that that declaration was made; I never have been in sympathy with it for a moment since it was made, and I shall not regard it as my cue for such tariff legislation as I feel ought to be undertaken.

Mr. BORAH. We are all insurgents, then, but from a different point of view?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think that may be true of everyone in the Chamber.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am glad to hear the opinions of my Republican associates here on the Republican platform. I have been standing on it since it was issued. I indorsed it during the campaign and fought for its observance two years ago, and I am standing for it and defending it now.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Kansas be kind enough to explain on what part of the tariff plank of that platform Republicans stand who favor the Canadian reciprocity bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are on the far end of the teeter.

Mr. BRISTOW. In my opinion——

Mr. NELSON. Did that platform contemplate a farmers' free-list bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or a free-wool bill?

Mr. NELSON. Or was the President elected on a pledge to pass a farmers' free-list bill? I should like to hear the Senator's views on these questions.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will undertake to give the Senator my view in rather concrete form as I proceed; but, to answer his question direct at this time, I do not believe that there ever was a declaration made in any Republican platform since the party was organized that would justify a tariff bill such as the one which is now before the Senate. Does that answer the Senator's question fully enough?

Mr. NELSON. No; I want to know what apology the Senator can make for the Republicans who are going to vote for the reciprocity bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. There is no apology for them.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will yield to me, I understood the question of the Senator from Minnesota was on what plank in that platform those Republicans stood.

Mr. BRISTOW. They are not standing on the platform.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, the truth of the matter is that they have all crawled under the platform, have they not?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think they are avoiding with great care the Republican platform and every Republican declaration of principles. As I was saying of this platform, which I see I have to defend against some of my Republican associates, it preserves and maintains the protective system as advocated by Hamilton, Clay, Lincoln, Blaine, and McKinley, and it will also protect the American people from the extortion of monopoly.

It takes out the evil that the greed and avarice of men, in these modern times, have injected into the protective system, and preserves its merits and advantages to the American producer. On that platform I stood two years ago, and upon it I stand now. If that declaration had been followed then, and excessive duties reduced to that level, the Republican Party would not now be in the minority in the lower branch of the American Congress and threatened with overwhelming defeat in the next election. Then I stood in this Chamber and protested against the violation of this party declaration and of the campaign pledges that were made following it. And I stand here now and denounce that violation of our party's pledge as vigorously as I did then. But the betrayal of the party platform at that time by refusing to reduce the duties where they were excessive does not justify the men who betrayed it in engaging in this free-trade propaganda upon which the President of the United States has embarked by this Canadian agreement. From an indorsement of the Payne-Aldrich bill, a most ultraprotective measure, as the best tariff law ever enacted by an American Congress, to the ardent advocacy of the free-trade measure now before us, is an example of political gymnastics rarely witnessed in American politics. Eighteen months ago the President, the senior Senators from Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, who I greatly regret are not honoring me with their presence at this time, and others were denouncing the Republicans who voted against the high duties of the Payne-Aldrich bill as traitors to the protective principle and the Republican Party, while now they have joined the Democratic Party in the support of a measure which their Democratic allies declare means the utter annihilation of the protective-tariff system. I leave it to the stand-pat Republicans and their Democratic cohorts to find consistency in the action of the President and his leaders.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I think we ought to have present some of the Senators now being referred to, in order that they may reply to these indictments, and so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Borah	Curtis	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Dixon	Nixon	Smoot
Brandegee	Gore	Oliver	Sutherland
Briggs	Gronna	Overman	Swanson
Bristow	Guggenheim	Page	Taylor
Burnham	Heyburn	Penrose	Warren
Clapp	La Follette	Perkins	Watson
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Poindexter	Wetmore
Crane	McCumber	Pomerene	Williams
Culberson	McLean	Rayner	Works
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Reed

Mr. OVERMAN. I again announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent unavoidably, and I also announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] are absent on important business of the Senate, and I desire this statement to stand for the day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like the statement which I formerly made as to the absence of my colleague, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], to stand for the balance of the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Montana may bring the Senators representing eastern manufacturing States into the Chamber by a roll call, but he can not compel them to listen to an indictment to which they know they can make no reply. I realize that it is not within my power to change a word of this Canadian bill. It will pass this body and be signed by the President. But while the Congress is giving the farmer free trade I appeal to the Senate to reduce some of the excessive duties on trust-controlled products which the American people are compelled to buy. I ask the Senate to attach a few paragraphs to the bill—paragraphs that in no way change the provisions of the agreement; that do not change a line, a syllable, or a letter of the President's arrangement with Canada, but that do take off from the manufactured products in this country some of the excessive protective duties that they now enjoy, and duties that are a burden to the American people. I have offered amendments reducing the duties on sugar, lead products, and rubber. I intend to vote for the amendments of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], reducing the duties on iron ore and steel products, and the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], reducing the duties on woolens and cottons, and any other amendment that seeks to reduce the duties to the measure fixed by the Republican national platform.

So I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas offers the following amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That on and after the day following the taking effect of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the following articles, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the following rates of duty, namely:

Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75°, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test up to 98°, thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; and above 98° by the polariscopic test, 1 cent and seven hundred and fifty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound; molasses testing not above 40°, 20 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40° and not above 56°, 3 cents per gallon; testing above 56°, 6 cents per gallon. Sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to perfect the amendment by the following additions: At the end of line 11, page 1, after the comma, insert "up to 98°."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas modifies his amendment as follows. The Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the word "test," at the end of the line, insert the words "up to 98°."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I followed the reading of the amendment not very carefully, but it seems to me that with the amendment now offered by the Senator it would not conform to the fore part of the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will explain that it does if the Senator will just give me an opportunity.

Mr. SMOOT. I will listen to the Senator's explanation. But as I caught it from the reading—I have sent for a copy of the amendment, but it has not yet arrived——

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well. I will explain the matter fully, and I do not think the Senator will seriously object; at least, I hope he will not.

Further perfecting the amendment, I ask, in line 13, on page 1, after the semicolon, that the following be inserted:

And above 98° by the polariscope test 1 cent and seven hundred and fifty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas further modifies his amendment as follows, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 13, after the semicolon following the word "proportion," insert the following:

And above 98° by the polariscope test 1 cent and seven hundred and fifty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. BRISTOW. In explanation I may say I have taken paragraph 216 of the tariff act of 1909 and stricken out of that paragraph the following words: "not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color"; and I have also stricken out the words in the seventh line in the paragraph following the semicolon after the word "proportion," "and on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and on all sugars which have gone through a process of refining one cent and ninety one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound."

The effect of this amendment is to reduce the duty on refined sugar from $1.90 a hundred to $1.75½ a hundred, and it takes out of the paragraph the provision relating to the Dutch standard.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The differential to-day on sugar is 7½ cents, making the protective part of it $1.82½; or, rather, the revenue and protective part $1.82½. I should like to ask the Senator what the 7 cents reduction is for and what it means?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will be glad to explain to the Senator my view in regard to that.

The duty on raw sugar at the present time is 95 cents per hundred for sugar testing 75° pure by the polariscope, and for each additional degree of purity there is added 3½ cents per hundred pounds, making pure sugar, or 100 per cent sugar, $1.82½. Then, in addition to that, there is another provision making the duty on refined sugar—that is, a sugar which has passed through the refineries that use bone black in the process of refining—$1.90, or 7½ cents more than pure sugar that has not gone through the process of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator will quite agree with that definition given when he has carefully considered the matter. The 7½ cents—the difference between one eighty-two and a half and one ninety is a differential that is given to the sugar refiner for the difference of cost between the refining of sugar in Germany or any other foreign country and this. The one eighty-two and a half, if the Senator will figure, is 95 cents for 75 per cent pure sugar, and then if he will figure on 3½ cents for each degree he will find that the amount of protection on sugar pure, 100 per cent, is one eighty-two and a half. But the 7½ cents that the Senator speaks of is a differential that is given to sugar refiners, claimed to be the difference between the cost of refining sugar in this country and refining sugar in a foreign country.

I think what the Senator refers to is the question of the Dutch standard, which does not come into the question of the 7½ cents differential.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I think——

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator has the two mixed. I simply call his attention to the fact that the difference is due to the differential.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not at all confused between the Dutch standard and the polariscope test. The Dutch standard has nothing to do with that which I am now discussing. The 7½ cents differential to which the Senator from Utah refers is a protective duty which is given the American refiners who use the bone-black process. Now, pure sugar may be produced by the centrifugal process. The bone-black process whitens sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. The centrifugal sugar, if the Senator will excuse me a moment, does not have that degree of whiteness which sugar does that is refined by the refineries that use the bone-black process. But centrifugal sugar that is 100 per cent pure is just as pure sugar, except it has not that whiteness of color, and this 7½ cents is the protection which the refiner gets or would get for refined sugar or sugar passed through bone black and crystallized.

Mr. SMOOT. I dislike to take issue with the Senator. But if he will just let me figure with him a minute he will see just where he is wrong.

Mr. BRISTOW. I shall be glad to have the Senator convince me that I am wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. The present law provides that the rate of duty upon sugar shall be 95 cents for 75 per cent pure sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, saccharine.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That leaves 25 per cent in the sugar; that is, 25 per cent of impurities; does it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes——

Mr. SMOOT. To make it 100 per cent pure.

Mr. BRISTOW. Instead of saying 25 per cent of impurities, I should say 25 per cent of other substances in the sugar that will not crystallize.

Mr. SMOOT. Those are impurities, taking pure sugar into consideration.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is part molasses and part water and low-grade sugars, part dirt and——

Mr. SMOOT. It is not sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly it will not crystallize.

Mr. SMOOT. Then we begin with that 95 cents. The duty upon each degree of purity above the 75 per cent is 3½ cents. To make it 100 per cent pure there are 25 degrees to charge for. Three and a half times the 25 degrees is 87½. Is not 3½ times 25 87½?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; 87½.

Mr. SMOOT. You take and add the 87½ to the 95 cents and it will give you what is the duty upon pure sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. The duty on pure sugar is $1.82½.

Mr. SMOOT. That makes $1.82½.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, pure sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred per cent pure sugar is $1.82½.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. But we say it shall be $1.90, and that 7½ cents is called the differential.

Before the Payne-Aldrich bill went into effect that differential was 12½ cents, making the rate $1.95. That differential is for the purpose, as I stated before, of protecting the sugar refinery in this country against the cheaper labor of a foreign country.

When it comes to the consideration of the Dutch standard, then that is another question and we will discuss that.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is another question entirely.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to get this correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRISTOW. Gladly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I gave this question a little study two years ago. I do not intend, of course, to take up the argument of the Senator from Kansas, but I ask in this connection whether or not it is his purpose in this amendment to strike out both the Dutch standard color and the differential?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator intends to destroy the differential, and his amendment is for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not read his amendment, but just listening to it being read from the desk I have no doubt that is what it is intended to do. First to take out the Dutch standard clause, and second to take out the 7½ cents differential, making the sugar duty $1.82½, your amendment of 98 per cent may make the 7 cents, which I asked you to explain.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will explain that as soon as I can get to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was in doubt whether his amendment would strike out both the Dutch standard of color and the differential of 7½ cents.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt of it. But what about the 7 cents, which I asked the Senator to explain?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is what I am going to explain.

Mr. SMOOT. When the Dutch standard comes up for discussion we must decide whether we want to retain it or not; whether it is the best policy for the American people or American producer.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to get this clear if I can, because it is very interesting to those of us who have studied it.

Under the law as it would stand with this differential taken off—this differential is just simply a protection to the concern that refines sugar by the bone-black process. The centrifugal producer gets no advantage out of it, because it refers only to that process of refining which is known as the bone-black process of refining. The Senator from Utah of course will admit that.

The $1.82½ is the full duty on pure sugar. But if that pure sugar should be melted, as it would not be of course, and passed through the process of refining—the bone-black process—then it would not be entitled, if the Dutch standard provision was taken out, to come in at a less duty than $1.90. That is admitted now.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite understand the statement made by the Senator from Kansas. But if I did, of course, I can not agree with him. The bone black that is used in the bleaching of sugar not only bleaches the sugar if it is 100 per cent pure as to saccharine, but it would bleach sugar that was 95, 96, and 97 per cent pure.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes; of course.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is one reason why we have the Dutch standard in the bill, because if it is left out Germany could use bone black and bleach 95 per cent sugar, and that sugar could be brought into this country, and there is no consumer who could tell the difference between the 95 per cent sugar and the 100 per cent sugar. But the Dutch standard protects the American consumer against any such action on the part of Germany or any other country.

Mr. BRISTOW. When I get to the Dutch standard I will take care of that and controvert the Senator's position, I think, without much difficulty. However, 95° sugar filtered through bone black would be pure after filtration.

I will just say now and then drop it, because I am not yet at that part of the discussion—that the Dutch standard is a device that is used in the interest of the sugar refiners, and contributes to their profits, and to no other purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not for the life of me see how it contributes to the sugar refiners. The beet-sugar industry has no refining other than simply the manufacturing of pure white sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not talking about beet sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. I say to the Senator that the Dutch standard is a protection that is given to the beet-sugar raiser, not to the sugar refiner.

Mr. BRISTOW. The beet-sugar raiser has no more interest in the Dutch standard than he has in the laws of the Hottentots.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be the thought and belief of the Senator from Kansas, but you can not make the beet-sugar producer or the man who raises the beets or is interested in the sugar factory believe any such thing.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have talked to a good many of the sugar producers, and they have no interest in the Dutch standard, and they say so to me without hesitation.

Now, I propose to take off not only the differential of 7½ cents, but to limit this advance of 3½ cents per degree in duty to 98 degrees, so as make $1.75½ the maximum duty collected on sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. Or, in other words, the Senator's amendment means this: That if the American sugar manufacturer manufactures his sugar pure or 100 per cent saccharine he would get no more protection than if he manufactured it 98 per cent pure.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is right.

Mr. SMOOT. Or if he manufactured it 100 per cent pure, Germany could manufacture sugar at 98 per cent pure, and it could come in here and be sold upon the same basis as the 100 per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not upon the same basis, but by paying the same duty.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the basis of the duty.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not for the life of me see what justice there is or what reason there is in such a proposition.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Utah will think this out a while and is interested in the domestic production, he will very clearly see that it is directly in the interest of the American producer of sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to listen to the Senator explain and tell why, because I am certainly interested in the sugar production of this country. I do not mean financially; I mean that I am interested in laws that will protect it and keep it alive.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Utah can not be more interested in the promotion of the beet-sugar industry than I am. He can not speak in higher praise of the development of that industry; and before I get through I hope to present reasons why the duty on sugar should be retained at a high figure when the tariff is ultimately revised according to my views, as it will be in time, I hope.

I hold in my hand here a bottle of sugar which is 100 per cent pure, as tested by the polariscope, and it is No. 25 Dutch standard in color. It is a pure sugar. It is a centrifugal sugar, as beautiful a specimen as I have ever seen. Those large crystals——

Mr. SMOOT. It is cane sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is cane, of course; made by the centrifugal process. Under the present law the duty on that is $1.90, but with the Dutch standard taken out the duty on it would be $1.82½.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is exactly where the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Dutch-standard provision is removed, it would be $1.82½.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Dutch standard is taken out, beet sugar of that grade would be $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly where the Senator is either sadly mistaken or else I am wofully wrong. I know that under the present tariff act that sugar entering into the United States will pay a duty of $1.90 a hundred.

Mr. BRISTOW. I say under the present tariff, because the Dutch standard controls.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present bill, if the Dutch standard was out, it would pay $1.90 a hundred.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not see how it would.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, it is above 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. But with the Dutch standard out, that would not control.

Mr. SMOOT. I will figure it in a minute. First, it is 95 for 75 per cent; that is, 95 cents for 75. There is 25 per cent representing units, at 3½ cents a unit, making 87½ cents, and $1.82½ is the duty on this, and the differential is 7½.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; the differential does not go on, because it has never been refined by the refinery that uses a process of bone-black filtering, and the product of which is commonly known as refined sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. No; beet sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. This is not beet sugar; it is cane sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be true, and it may have passed and may never have passed through the process of bone-black refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. It has not passed through the process of refining, as known to the law, and therefore the rate of $1.90 would not apply to it.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the sugar is concerned, the Senator can not tell whether it has passed through that process or not.

Mr. BRISTOW. But this is imported; I got it from the customhouse.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, if it has not passed through the process of refining, that is true; it is $1.82½. If it has passed through under the law of the Dutch standard, it is $1.90 duty. I am free to admit that under the Senator's amendment it would not be that. Under the Senator's amendment the most that it could possibly pay would be $1.75½, and it would be $1.75½ if it were 99 per cent pure, it would be $1.75½ if it were 98 per cent pure, and it would be $1.72 if it were 97 per cent pure.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is true. There is no difference between the Senator from Utah and myself as to that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRISTOW. Just wait until I answer the Senator from Utah. I want to show him wherein he is wrong. The duty on sugar, as he has stated, is 95 cents a hundred for sugar that is 75 per cent pure, and for each additional degree of purity 3½ cents per hundred is added. So the duty on pure sugar is $1.82½. But there is a provision in the law which says that sugar which is above No. 16 Dutch standard or that has passed through a process of refining shall pay $1.90.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a minute. This is above No. 16 Dutch standard, but it has not passed through the process of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, just a minute. If the Dutch-standard provision was taken out then the duty on that sugar would be $1.82½.

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because it has not passed through the process of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. I tell the Senator it has passed through the process of refining. If that sugar had not been refined it would have come from the tank bottom with all its impurities. I know the whole process of cane-sugar manufacture. You can not tell me that that sugar has not gone through the process of refining. I know that it has gone through a centrifugal process, and 23 per cent of the impurities have been taken from it by that process. It is true, as the Senator has said, that the Dutch standard would leave it that way if it had not gone through the process of refining, but the law says that if it has gone through any process of refining it shall be $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Utah knows that of the sugar which comes into New York nine-tenths at least goes through the centrifugal process of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that every particle of sugar that comes from Cuba has gone through the centrifugal process. I know that it is not above 96 per cent pure, and I know that the refiners have been taking it——

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; and I will explain to the Senator exactly why it comes in below the 96 per cent grade.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator need not explain it to me. I know why.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, if the Senator knows, he ought to be a little more frank with the Senate in treating on this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I take exceptions to that statement, because I want to say that I have nothing whatever to conceal in this whole proposition in any way, shape, or form. I know cane sugar made in Cuba, that there is no process of refining in Cuba whereby it can come into this country 100 per cent pure. I know it.

Mr. BRISTOW. It could not come in 75 per cent pure without some process of refining. Of course, even the old muscovado process is a method of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is exactly what the law says.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then the Senator is entirely mistaken. The Senator must certainly know that if it was not for the provision of the Dutch standard, which makes all sugars above 16, or above the sugar in this bottle, which I hold in my hand, all of a color that is lighter than that, pay as much duty as if it were refined.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; but——

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, just a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator is getting at is not what is the purpose of the Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just hold on a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. The Dutch standard is for this purpose, that a sugar which comes into this country as white or whiter even than that, if the Dutch standard was not in the law, could come in if it were only 92 per cent sugar, and neither the Senator from Kansas nor the Senator from Utah nor any other man in this country would know whether it was 100 per cent or 92 per cent pure. All the Dutch standard is for is to protect the American consumer when he buys white sugar, so that he may know it is 100 per cent and not 96 per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. That the record may be clear, I will repeat my statement. The sole mission of the Dutch standard is to preserve the exclusive market for all imported sugars to the American sugar refiners and to prevent sugars from going to the public that are of a high degree of centrifugal refinement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not know that I ought to precipitate myself into this controversy——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator from Kansas was about to yield to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has been on the floor for some time.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to occupy a long time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I simply want to ask a question for information.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Reed
Bourne	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Root
Brandegee	Curtis	Nelson	Shively
Bristow	Dixon	Oliver	Smith, Mich
Brown	Foster	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	Gronna	Page	Sutherland
Burnham	Guggenheim	Paynter	Swanson
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Penrose	Taylor
Clapp	La Follette	Perkins	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Poindexter	Watson
Crane	McCumber	Pomerene	Wetmore
Culberson	McLean	Rayner	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator will proceed. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand the Senator from Kansas, he says that on sugar which will show 100 per cent test and that has gone through the refining process the duty would be $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But that this particular sugar which he exhibits would only pay $1.82, although it shows 100 per cent test.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that is because it has not gone through the bone-black process but has gone through the centrifugal process. Now, I ask the Senator whether the centrifugal process is not itself a refining process?

Mr. BRISTOW. All raw sugar goes through one of two processes of refining or purifying—the old process of settling or the centrifugal process, which is similar to the method employed by the farmer's separator which separates the cream from the milk.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question I want to submit to the Senator is whether any process which takes out of the material the impurities is not a refining process?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The centrifugal process takes out of the material these impurities and renders the sugar more pure. Therefore, the centrifugal process itself is a refining process and comes within the terms of the law. In other words, the duty would be $1.90 whether it had gone through one refining process or the other.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Utah is mistaken in that respect, and I will explain to him in a moment just why he is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Wait until I answer the question, please.

Here is a bottle of sugar that tests 97 per cent pure by the polariscope. It is in color No. 16 Dutch standard. It is a centrifugal sugar. It has gone through the process of centrifugal refining. It has not been refined to the degree of purity that the sugar in this bottle, which is No. 25 in color, has. They were both produced by the centrifugal process, which I refer to as a process of refining. This [indicating] is 16 Dutch standard, and, being 97° pure as to saccharine strength, tested by the polariscope, it would come in and pay $1.72 a hundred pounds duty, because it is 97 and not above No. 16 in color.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator——

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Utah must admit that is right. This is 97 sugar and it is not above 16 in color.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is exactly what I should like to admit, and what I want the Senator from Kansas to admit. There are 3 per cent of impurities in that sugar, are there not?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we are unable to hear the Senators on the other side. They are close together and talking to each other; we can not hear them.

Mr. SMOOT. I was saying that there are 3 per cent of impurities in that sugar. The man who buys that sugar has to lose the 3 per cent of impurities to get pure sugar, has he not?

Mr. BRISTOW. We are not discussing that. We are discussing the amount of duty that he pays.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course. Why should it pay as much as 100 per cent?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not a question as to why it should. The question I was discussing with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is what duty it does pay.

Mr. SMOOT. I can figure it out in just a minute.

Mr. BRISTOW. It pays $1.72, does it not? It is 97.

Mr. SMOOT. It pays $1.72, and that is a reduction of 18 cents.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a minute. Let us keep to the question of the Senator's colleague. This sugar has gone through the centrifugal process of refining until it is up to 16 in color and 97 in purity. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. I should judge so, from the looks of it.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is what it is labeled, and it was labeled at the customhouse 16 in color and 97 in purity. Under the present law it would pay $1.72 duty. It has gone through the process of refining up to that point. Now, the reason that this sugar [indicating]——

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator said that it had not gone through any refining process.

Mr. BRISTOW. It has gone through the centrifugal process of refining, but not the bone-black process of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. But does the Senator think that the sugar could come in at a duty of $1.72 if it were not for the Dutch standard?

Mr. BRISTOW. I say so now.

Mr. SMOOT. Not under the present law, because that sugar has been refined. It has gone through a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. It has gone through exactly the same process of refining as this [indicating].

Mr. SMOOT. True, but it is a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is a process of refining; and why does this sugar not pay $1.90?

Mr. SMOOT. Because there is 3 per cent of impurities in it.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is because it is not above No. 16. That is the reason, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not the reason; but there is 3 per cent difference in the saccharine in the two sugars. The duty upon every degree is 3½ cents. So that would be 11½ cents with the tariff; and if all the impurities are taken out of it, it would be 18 cents.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is confusing himself and confusing the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, I am not, Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will listen to me for just a moment, I have some hope at least of convincing his colleagues.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me an interruption, as I am very much interested in this discussion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. In his colloquy he holds up a bottle and refers to it as "this," and then another bottle and refers to it as "this," and that will not mean much in the RECORD. I wanted to suggest, if he would not take it unkindly—and I think this is important—is there no way in which the Senator can more particularly refer to the various exhibits?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will try to refer to the bottles, so that the Senator can understand the difference between them at a distance. As I was saying, in answer to the question of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], this bottle which I now hold in my hand [indicating] tests 97 by the polariscope, which is the purity of the sugar, its saccharine quality. In color by the test which is known as the Dutch standard it is No. 16. The rate of duty on that sugar if imported would be $1.72, made up in this way: Under the law sugar testing 75 per cent pure by the polariscope pays a duty of 95 cents a hundred, and for each additional degree of purity 3½ cents a hundred is added.

Mr. SMOOT. Three and a half cents a unit.

Mr. BRISTOW. For each additional degree of purity 3½ cents per hundred pounds is added.

The duty on this sugar [indicating] testing 97 or 22 degrees more than 75 is 95 cents, plus 22 times 3½, or $1.72. This sugar has gone through a process of refining known as the centrifugal process. The great majority of sugars which are manufactured now are made by that process, it being a modern process of purifying sugar. There is, however, a provision in the law which requires that when sugar reaches a degree of whiteness above this, which is 16, that then the full duty on refined or granulated sugar shall be assessed.

I hold as a matter of comparison another bottle in my hand [indicating], which in color is No. 17 Dutch standard. That sugar, if imported under the present law, would carry a duty of $1.90 or 18 cents more than this [indicating], which is 16 in color. The degree of purity, tested by the polariscope, of this sugar [indicating], which is 17 in color, is 98.6. If the Dutch standard provisions were taken out of the law this 17 sugar, which is 98.6, would pay $1.79 duty, because the duty would then be assessed on the purity, on the saccharine strength of the sugar, and not on its color.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. To get back to the question—I want to answer this question fully, and then I will yield to the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say——

Mr. BRISTOW. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] inquires if these sugars have not both gone through a process of refining as has this sugar [indicating], which is 100 per cent pure and 25 per cent in color. That has a perfect color. Under the present law those sugars, dark and white, pay the same duty, because they are both above the 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that those same sugars under the present law would pay $1.90 if the Dutch standard was out, because both of those sugars have gone through a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me ask the Senator why this sugar [exhibiting] does not pay $1.90?

Mr. SMOOT. It has gone through a process of refining and would pay $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. When 16 in color?

Mr. SMOOT. If it is 16 or under.

Mr. BRISTOW. If 16?

Mr. SMOOT. If it has gone through a process of refinement.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator mean to say that all centrifugal sugar pays the full duty?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not mean to say that the centrifugal sugar pays the same duty, but I say that washed sugars pay the duty. That is a process of refining, and the Senator said there are only two processes of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not, except as to raw sugars in the process of manufacturing.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to tell my colleague that there were only two processes of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. I referred to the two processes of manufacturing as processes of refining. There are three processes, considering the bone-black process, but one of them should not be given much consideration now, because it makes the very dark sugars, the muscavado sugars—that is, where the refining is by settling in hogsheads and drainage, but that has largely been discarded, except in the cruder factories. I want to ask the Senator from Utah——

Mr. SMOOT. Let me answer the question about washing sugars.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment. Here is a sugar [indicating] which is No. 16 Dutch standard. It is a centrifugal sugar; it is 97 pure. The Senator agreed with me a few moments ago that that sugar paid a duty of $1.72 when it was imported.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I said that if the duty were paid upon the amount of saccharine in it, without any process of refining, and not taking that into consideration, it would pay $1.72. The Senator is correct in saying that. But, Mr. President, whenever sugar passes through a process of refining under the present law, whether the Dutch standard applies or not, it pays $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator consider the centrifugal process a process of refining? I should like the Senator to answer that question, if he will. Does the Senator consider the centrifugal method a process of refining?

Mr. SMOOT. I consider the centrifugal process a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator claim, then——

Mr. SMOOT. And I consider also that the washing of sugar is a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment now. The Senator said that he considered the centrifugal process a process of refining. Does the Senator claim that all of the centrifugal sugars pay $1.90 duty?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think they do.

Mr. BRISTOW. All centrifugal sugars?

Mr. SMOOT. All centrifugal sugars. There are sugars that come from the Philippine Islands, of course, that now come in here free.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator think that all centrifugal sugar which comes from Cuba pays $1.90 duty less 20 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that all centrifugal sugar is in the shape of refined sugar, and all sugar that has gone through that process pays that amount.

Mr. BRISTOW. Through the centrifugal process?

Mr. SMOOT. Through the centrifugal process.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, the Senator, of course, will consider this to-morrow and say that he was mistaken, because he certainly is.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know what the Senator is going to say as to what a centrifugal is, but I want to say that wherever sugar is taken from the pan—speaking now of cane sugar—and is refined by any process, it pays $1.90. That is what I say; and I am not going to be drawn into the question of what the Senator is going to call "a centrifugal."

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to make the statement here, and I make it without any hesitation, that the Senator from Utah is absolutely, unqualifiedly, and unequivocally mistaken as to the fact; and if he will inquire at the Treasury Department he will find that he is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRISTOW. The only sugars that pay the full $1.90 are sugars that are above No. 16 Dutch standard. If a sugar is above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, regardless of its purity, it pays $1.90; if it is not above No. 16, then the only test applied is the polariscope test, which is as to its purity; and if it is 97, it pays $1.72; if it is 96, it pays $1.68½; if it is 95, it pays $1.65; and if it is 98, it pays $1.75½.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that the Senator from Kansas uses the Dutch standard for an argument in a way that is absolutely contrary to what the Dutch standard is for. The Dutch standard——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, this is not a question of what the Dutch standard is for, but what the Dutch standard does. We are trying to settle a statement of facts.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will tell the Senator what the Dutch standard does.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well?

Mr. SMOOT. The Dutch standard does this: As the Senator knows, sugar can be brought in here that is bleached and that is not 100 per cent pure. If it were not for the Dutch standard they could bring in this bleached sugar for less than $1.90 a hundred and sell it to the American people as 100 per cent pure sugar. The Dutch standard will not allow that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Regardless of its purity.

Mr. SMOOT. Regardless of its purity, as the Senator from Michigan suggests. It is a protection to the consumer who buys sugar in this country. If there was a law passed compelling the branding of all sugar so as to show exactly how much saccharine is in it, then the Dutch standard would not be necessary; but there is no such law, and without the Dutch standard the sugar coming in here at 95 per cent, bleached, would cost the same to the customer that a 100 per cent pure sugar would, and the customer would never know it. That is the object of the Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may be clear I want to state, with all due respect to the Senator from Utah and without in any way impugning his motives, because I know they are good, that the argument he has just made is a device which has been gotten up and which has been exploited by the American Sugar Trust to keep the Dutch standard provision in the law, and it has spent large amounts of money throughout the country in advertising this fiction in order to keep in the law this provision, which gives it practically a monopoly of the purchase of every pound of sugar that comes into the American market.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator speaks of spending money. The most money I have known as being spent in that regard was the money that was collected by a Mr. Bass, living and owning sugar mills in Porto Rico. I have the correspondence and the circulars signed by him, asking that money be raised and sent to him for the purpose of knocking out the Dutch standard, so that his sugars could come in here in any shape he desired, whether they were 100 per cent pure or not.

Mr. BRISTOW. If he lived in Porto Rico, the sugar could come in here without paying any duty. The Dutch standard is nothing to him, because he has got free sugar if he lives in Porto Rico.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Cuban sugar could not.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator stated that the gentleman lived in Porto Rico and owned sugar mills in Porto Rico.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not positive as to whether he owned sugar plantations in Cuba or not.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I shall have to make a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to make a point of order. It seems to me that we might proceed with a little more order. We have here a conversation going on, and others who ask for recognition are denied it for long periods of time. It seems to me that a man who rises and addresses the Chair is entitled to be recognized, and that the man who breaks in and answers another without appealing to the Chair should be called to order.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. It is not as to the Dutch standard. The discussion on that matter has been very interesting, but we seem to be about where we were when we started a couple of hours ago. I want, however, to ask the Senator if he knows what is the foreign price of sugar per hundred to-day on both of the samples he has of 16 and 17 Dutch standard, upon which he says the duty is $1.90 a hundred?

Mr. BRISTOW. The price, of course, varies in different countries. I have here the English price, which I will be very glad to give to the Senator. The English price on 96 sugars—that is, sugars that are only 96 in purity—in 1910 the average price in London was 2.90\frac{7}{16}$ per hundred, and in New York——

Mr. DIXON. The duty or the price?

Mr. BRISTOW. The price; but that would be with the duty.

Mr. WARREN. I mean entirely without duty, the original wholesale price.

Mr. BRISTOW. Without duty—well, the price in London was $2.90 duty paid, and the duty on 96 sugar would be 39, practically 40 cents—39 and a major fraction. That would be 40 cents less than $2.90, or $2.50; and the price in New York would be 4.18\frac{8}{16}$, less, probably, about $1.68.

Mr. WARREN. What I want to get at is the original cost of sugar at wholesale, the amount of duty added, and about what percentage that duty would be upon the first or original cost of the sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. About what the per cent of the duty is?

Mr. WARREN. About what percentage the duty is.

Mr. BRISTOW. There are various grades of sugar, and it depends, of course, upon whether the sugar that we import comes from Cuba or from other foreign countries. On 95 Cuban sugar—I have a bottle here of 95 sugar—our ad valorem duty is 49 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. That is less the drawback, of course?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; they get a 20 per cent reduction. On sugar from other countries it is 66 per cent on 95 sugar, on 97 sugar it is 62 per cent, and from Cuba it is 36 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. What is the highest percentage from any country the Senator has there?

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course that depends upon the price that is paid for the sugar. The sugar may be impure, and the impurities may consist, possibly, of molasses or dirt.

Mr. WARREN. It might reach 100 per cent in some cases.

Mr. BRISTOW. It does not reach 100 here. The highest that I noticed given by the figures of the Bureau of Statistics of the imports for consumption for the year 1910 is 98 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator believes in a liberal customhouse tariff upon sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARREN. I believe in that, too. But I wanted to get in the RECORD something as to the percentage, because we so often are attacked on the customs duties on various things on the percentage. It does not seem to me it makes any difference whether it is 10 per cent or 100 per cent if it is necessary in one case and not burdensome to the consumer in the other.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will state for the information of the Senator that about 80 per cent of our importations of sugar comes from Cuba and tests 95 in purity and not above 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator has figures showing this and that they will go into the RECORD with his speech.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. We imported last year from Cuba more than 3,000,000,000 pounds of sugar that tested 95 by the polariscope and was not above 16 Dutch standard in color, and that comprises almost 80 per cent of our entire importations of sugar, and the ad valorem duty on that sugar as given here was 49.77 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. With the polariscope test the Senator from Kansas would lead us to believe that the Dutch standard is not essential at all to the insurance of pure sugar in our markets.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not in the least.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That a sugar may test above 96 and yet be below the Dutch standard, and therefore be excluded or reclassified.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. Or it might be below 96, and above 16 in color.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On the other hand, is it not true that certain kinds of sugar from Cuba may be so treated that they would pass the Dutch standard test and not pass the polariscope test?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no; the Dutch standard——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I mean as to color.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; this process of bleaching which the Senator from Utah complains of is a fiction. I state that without any hesitation. It has no place in a serious consideration of the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire a little information from the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ascertain whether the Senator believes there is a difference in the construction of the law given by those who pass upon the imports and the law itself. If I understand the argument of the Senator correctly, it makes no difference; whether we have the Dutch standard or not there will be levied ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound upon sugar.

If I read the law correctly, there are three bases of estimating the revenues or the duties. The one is without reference to the matter of refinement at all. The other has reference to refinement. The third has reference to the Dutch standard.

For instance, section 216 says:

> Sugars not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color, etc., concentrated, etc., testing by the polariscope not above 75°, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound.

That is without reference to whether or not the sugar has been refined.

Mr. BRISTOW. That sugar is refined, of course, to 75°.

Mr. McCUMBER. But there is nothing in the provision itself that says it shall apply to refined sugar, and that is what I want to get at.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. Let me follow that. On sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in color is a second class. That bears 1 cent per pound additional.

Mr. BRISTOW. Above? Oh, no——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me see. It is not "or"; it is "and." Yes; thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, "and on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in color"—"and," not "or"—"and on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining."

That would seem therefore to differentiate between simply the Dutch standard in color, and sugar that has been refined. So there are two classes there, and each of them adds 1 cent and ninety one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound. Is that not correct?

Mr. BRISTOW. This is true: If it has passed through the process of refining, or is above No. 16 Dutch standard, it pays $1.90. That process of refining refers to the bone-black process, which is the process used by the American refiners. But the sugar factories now have a process of sugar making known as the "centrifugal" process, which will produce sugar that is very much above 16 Dutch standard in color and is pure in quality.

Being above 16 Dutch standard it carries the full duty just as though it had been refined by the bone-black process, though it has never been refined in that way.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator claim that there is a difference in the duty, based upon the different methods of refining?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. But there is nothing in the law that recognizes that difference. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me state the facts as given here by the Bureau of Statistics——

Mr. McCUMBER. But what I wanted to get at is why the customhouse officers should make a distinction that is not in the law itself.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because if they do not, all sugars which are imported would carry $1.90 a hundred duty, and it was not intended they should. It is only the refined sugar. This sugar that is contained in this bottle I have here is granulated sugar, which I purchased at a store. This is refined sugar. It has been refined by an American sugar refinery. That is what is referred to in the law, and the centrifugal process of manufacturing and refining sugar is not taken into consideration in the law in using the term "refined."

Mr. McCUMBER. Is that not regarded as a refined process?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not at the customhouses.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it or is it not regarded as a refined process at the customhouse?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. The centrifugal process——

Mr. BRISTOW. It is not regarded as a process of refining at the customhouse. I will illustrate that by reading from these statistics.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the point. The Senator had not explained that before.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. We imported last year 3,000,000,000 pounds of sugar that was 95° pure by the polariscope. If the Senator from Utah will listen, I will convince him that he is absolutely wrong and will leave it to any customhouse official in the United States—and I am taking the official reports here to convince him right now. We imported last year from Cuba 3,000,000,000 pounds of sugar that was 95° pure and not above 16 Dutch standard, and that sugar paid $1.65 less 20 per cent.

Now, we imported 377,000,000 pounds of sugar from different countries, not above 96° pure, and on that we collected 1.68\frac{5}{10}$ per hundred pounds. Now, that was 96° pure, and not above 16 Dutch standard.

We imported from Cuba 2,369,000 pounds of sugar that was 97° pure, and not above 16 Dutch standard, upon which a duty of $1.72 a hundred was paid less the 20 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is that refined sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is centrifugal sugar. All of the sugar that I am now referring to is centrifugal sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. But not above 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. But not above 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. McCUMBER. And not regarded as refined.

Mr. BRISTOW. And not regarded as refined at the customhouses. But it was refined and purified by the centrifugal process.

Mr. SMOOT. But it was under 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was under 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. BRISTOW. We imported from various countries 15,000,000 pounds that was not above 98 degrees pure, that was not above 16 Dutch standard, and that paid $1.755.

None of that sugar was above the 16 Dutch standard. It paid from $1.65 to $1.75 per 100 pounds, dependent upon its purity. That was all centrifugal sugar or sugar that was made by the centrifugal process. But in the law the word "refined" is applicable only to sugar which has been passed through the process of refining known as the "bone-black process," which is used by the American refiner.

The provision of the Dutch standard limiting this to not above 16 in color makes any sugar that is above 16 pay, instead of what it would pay according to the polariscope test on its purity, the full duty, because it is of a light color regardless of its purity, and being of a light color and above 16 it has to pay the full duty just the same as though it were refined sugar, such as is contained in this bottle which I now hold in my hand.

So the Senator from Utah, I hope, will now concede that all centrifugal sugars below or not above 16 Dutch standard pay a duty on the polariscope test.

Mr. SMOOT. When they are under No. 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. When they are under No. 16 Dutch standard. If they are over 16 Dutch standard then they pay the full $1.90 regardless of the polariscopic test.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I said before, as I understand it.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is what I have been trying to get the Senator from Utah to admit all the afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. You have not been trying to get me to admit that at all. You have been trying to get me to admit that the Dutch standard was for a purpose it is not for.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not been trying to get the Senator to admit the Dutch standard was for anything, and any Senator who has followed this argument certainly knows that my contention was that until 16 is reached the only test applied in fixing the duty on sugar is the polariscopic test, and that is as to its purity. And I have exhibited here a bottle of sugar. That [indicating] is 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, and I am not going to do it any more this afternoon, but I suppose here is just as good a time as any to call the Senator's attention to this fact: Sugar under 16 Dutch standard could not be sold to the American people. The American people would not buy sugar under the 16 Dutch standard. So it would have no effect whatever upon the market. But when it gets above 16 Dutch standard it can be bleached, and as the purity of the sugar does not show in the color of the sugar, through that means the public can be deceived, and that is why the Dutch standard was adopted.

Mr. REED. I want to ask right in connection——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment. I want to answer the Senator from Utah.

Mr. REED. I wanted to ask the Senator a question right in connection with that.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to answer this before I am interrupted. Then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

The Senator from Utah has said that the American people would not use a sugar which was below 16 Dutch standard, because of its impurities—the consumer would not.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator please repeat what he did say?

Mr. SMOOT. I said the American people would not purchase sugar the color of which came under the 16 Dutch standard. That is what I said. I know just as well as the Senator knows that there is sugar 98 per cent pure which could come under the 16 Dutch standard. There is not a question about that. But you can not take a sugar like that which the Senator holds in his hand and have the American people buy it. There is no danger from a deception of that kind. The people know that it is not pure, and therefore they can not be deceived. But when it is above the 16 Dutch standard in color, then it gets close to where the people may think it is a pure sugar, and through the bleaching or the washing process they can impose upon the American people and have a white sugar only carrying 95 per cent. I do not want to say anything more. That is the absolute truth of the matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. The bottle which I hold in my hand, and which the Senator from Utah has just had, is No. 15 Dutch standard in color, and it tests 99 per cent pure. The reason that can not find a market is because it is too dark, although it is an excellent sugar and is pure, testing 99 per cent by the polariscope, which is as pure as a great deal of the granulated sugar we purchase. It is an excellent sugar, but it is too dark for the people to buy. So when it arrives at this market the maker of that sugar has but one purchaser, and that is the sugar refiners. Therefore, if this 99 per cent sugar, which is pure and which probably was darkened in order to keep it below 16 and thereby avoid the high duty, had come in, it would have paid $1.79 duty. But as it is now there is none of it imported. It is the 95 that is 4 degrees less than this that is imported. The result is that practically the only market for foreign sugars is the sugar refineries, and the No. 16 Dutch standard provision which is in this bill confines that market to these concerns and gives them a monopoly of it. This theory of washing sugar is a fiction, because anyone knows who is familiar with the subject that the loss in the process of washing it is so great that no refiner ever undertakes to purify it that way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has now admitted just exactly what I had stated, that that sugar can not be sold to the American people because of its darkness.

Mr. BRISTOW. That has always been my argument.

Mr. SMOOT. Then he complains most bitterly because that sugar pays $1.79 and refined sugar pays $1.90. There are 2 per cent of the impurities that have to come out of that sugar in refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to correct the Senator's statement. I do not complain because the sugar pays $1.79. I complain because the Dutch standard makes it pay $1.90 when it is above 16 in color. It is 99 per cent sugar instead of 98 per cent. There is only 1 degree of foreign substance in it, and much of the granulated sugar that is bought in the stores has a fraction of a degree and sometimes 1 degree of impurities in it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just what I have stated, only the Senator is trying to make the Dutch standard apply in another way. If the Senate of the United States wants to take the 7½ cents differential off, which is a protection to the American sugar refiner, that is another question. That is in this 11 cents, and all that is left after that is the 3½ cents, which is the amount of duty upon the 1 degree of impurities that are to be taken out.

The American Sugar Refining Co. makes nothing on that. They lose that. Nobody gets that in the refining, because it goes into molasses and the impurities, but the American Sugar Refining Co. has a differential of 7½ cents. If it were not for that, the sugar would be refined in Cuba and come into this country refined, and Cuban labor would have the refining of the sugar rather than the American laborers.

Mr. President, as I stated before, I am not here talking for the sugar refiners or for a 7½-cent differential to them. That is another question. But when it comes to the question of taking out the Dutch standard it means that 95 per cent sugar can come into this country and be sold to the American consumer upon the same basis as sugar of 100 per cent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. I am sure it will not interrupt the Senator. The Senator from Utah has said with a great deal of force several times—that is, with a great deal of force so far as the tone of voice was concerned—that sugar below 16 Dutch standard would not be used by the American people. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas kindly to state the amount of it which was actually imported into this country last year, if he has the figures; if not, the figures of the last year that he does have.

Mr. BRISTOW. The amount of sugar below 16 Dutch standard?

Mr. REED. Yes; any kind that is below 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a moment I will answer the question, if the Senator will have patience with me.

Mr. REED. Certainly. I am sorry to disturb the Senator's line of thought.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is no disturbance. I am glad to answer it, because my line of thought has been somewhat interrupted, and I will have to go back and begin again anyway.

There was imported into the United States last year 2,857,005 tons of sugar not above 16 Dutch standard in color.

Mr. REED. Then practically all of the sugar which was imported into this country last year was below No. 16 Dutch standard; so that it amounts to this, that for practical purposes all of the sugar coming to this country is below 16 Dutch standard. Now, that sugar is ultimately used by the American people?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is.

Mr. REED. And any burden placed upon it is ultimately paid by the American people?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is.

Mr. REED. And instead of the American people consuming it direct, it has to be refined in this country?

Mr. BRISTOW. It does.

Mr. REED. And the refiners who get possession of it, the Senator contends, are those who are ultimately benefited?

Mr. BRISTOW. Practically the only market for this 2,857,005 tons of sugar was to the sugar refiners. Very little of it went to the public, because it is of such a dark color that the public will not use it. So the result of this color standard is that a sugar which is light enough to be used upon our tables or in our homes, such as that [indicating], would have to pay just as much duty as if it were refined; and if it were put on the market in competition with the refined sugar, of course it would not sell. So it is forced out of the American market. The only purchaser of the sugar when it comes to our country is the refiner. He has a monopoly of the sugar business because of this provision, and the purpose of the provision is to preserve that monopoly. I say it without hesitation.

Mr. REED. I want to say, lest I should be misunderstood, that I fully agree with the Senator, and I simply asked my question in order, if possible, to clear up the situation suggested by the remarks of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SWANSON. I have been listening to the very interesting speech of the Senator from Kansas, and I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I shall be very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Utah stated that the reason why they had had this color test and this 16 Dutch standard was to prevent the importation of impure sugar. If I understood the Senator from Utah correctly, those sugars were much adulterated on account of being bleached, but they did not measure up when tested by the amount of saccharine matter in them.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to know, if that is true, whether there is any law that is more rigorous for the American refiners in requiring them to have sugar test than there is on the importation of sugars from other countries? What law have you which compels the American Sugar Trust to have a certain amount of saccharine matter or color in their sugar, except the pure-food law, which would apply alike to importations and to the American products?

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to make this statement——

Mr. SWANSON. Is there any law which does that?

Mr. BRISTOW. In answer to the question, I would say the same law would protect the American people from impure sugars and bad sugar being placed upon the markets by a foreigner that would protect them from such sugar produced in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Louisiana. If there were a cheap process by which sugar could be whitened and put upon the market, is there anyone who believes that the American Sugar Refining Co. would be too honest to take advantage of that process?

The Senator here made a very violent attack upon a Mr. Bass. I heard of this Mr. Bass two years ago, but know little about him. He may be a scoundrel or he may not be; I do not know; but I will venture the statement that he is as honest a man as the men who have been controlling the sugar-refining business in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not deny that.

Mr. BRISTOW. If you could put impure sugars on the market, whitening them by a cheap process that costs less than the process of refining, the American markets would have been flooded long ago by them. But it is not possible; it is not practicable. This bleaching process, which is a kind of sulphur process that has been tried at times in England, is a failure, because sugar so bleached will darken in a very short time. Standing in a barrel it becomes darker than it was before it was bleached. The bleaching theory is a fiction which is designed to confuse the public and preserve the Dutch-standard provision that gives the American refiners the monopoly of the importers' market.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him another question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; I will be very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand from what the Senator from Utah says, there was some law—not a process—which made it impossible to have refined sugar impure, if manufactured in this country, but that if it was imported it could be made impure. I should like to know what law there is on the statute books that requires an American manufacturer of sugar to have it any purer or better than sugar which is imported. If the pure-food law could apply to sugar manufactured in America, it seems to me it would equally apply to sugar imported into this country.

Mr. BRISTOW. It could and does.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator stated, sugar that is imported into this country is impure. There is not more than a few hundred or at least a few thousand tons of sugar——

Mr. BRISTOW. There were about 800 tons imported last year.

Mr. SMOOT. That come in here pure. The other comes in here impure. But every sack of sugar that is made in the United States is sacked under the supervision of the representative of the Treasury Department, and it must be pure 100 per cent sugar. That is not the case with sugar imported into this country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. One other question for information. There is a test for the purity of sugar. What is it called?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is the polariscopic test. That is the scientific process which tests the saccharine strength of sugar.

Mr. REED. That test the Senator from Utah says is applied at the factory.

Mr. BRISTOW. And it is also applied at the customhouse.

Mr. REED. I do not know whether the Senator is in the sugar refining business.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not at all.

Mr. REED. The test which is applied at the factories could be applied at the customhouse, whether it is or not.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is applied at the customhouse. The duty is measured by its purity if it is below 16 Dutch standard in color——

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator to say further, as he has studied this question and I have not, that the question of the color of sugar does not at all determine its purity.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not at all.

Mr. REED. So we come to this: If the Government can protect the people upon American refined sugar by inspecting the factory, the Government can in like manner protect them upon any sugar which would be imported in a refined state.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If that is true, the Dutch standard written in the law in no manner protects the American people against impure sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not at all. The Dutch standard serves just one purpose, and that is to confine the market for imported sugars to the refiners.

Mr. SWANSON. It serves two purposes: First to give them an absolute monopoly in the purchase of all raw material known as sugar that comes in; second, it gives them an absolute monopoly against all white sugar being imported in competition with their product.

Mr. BRISTOW. That monopoly is provided by the excessive duty on imported refined sugars; that is $1.90. That is a prohibitive duty.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask, if there was no Dutch standard in the law, is there anybody but a refiner who could buy the sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. Why not now, then?

Mr. BRISTOW. Because the duty is prohibitive.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. Any man can buy it in this country at any time if he has the money.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have the Louisiana product.

Mr. BRISTOW. We have the Louisiana product, and the Senator, if he is informed, knows that there is almost a third of the Louisiana product which finds a market direct to the people of this country without ever going to a refinery.

Mr. SMOOT. I know this: I know that all the beet sugar goes direct to the people without ever going to a refinery.

I want to state, so that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] may know, that if there was no Dutch standard in the law the only ones who would buy sugar coming into this country would be a refiner or one who intends to refine it, and that is the case to-day. Anyone in the United States can buy it. The Dutch standard has nothing to do with that. The only question that would effect a monopoly is the 7½ cents differential; that is all. Anyone who wants to start a refinery for sugar would have the same differential, so the Dutch standard has nothing to do with that.

Mr. BRISTOW. This discussion has wandered off on the Dutch standard, which was the second part of my argument. I have had to meet these questions that have come up. I wanted to get to that later in the discussion. But in answer to the Senator from Virginia, I will speak for a moment of the high-grade centrifugal sugars, which are sugars that have been refined at the factory by the centrifugal process, which is a rotary process, exactly similar to the process that is now used in separating cream from milk on the farm. The sugar is thrown into a whirling vat, and the molasses, which is the heavier, is thrown out by a rotary motion of some 1,500 revolutions a minute. So the sugar in the center of the receptacle gradually whitens as the molasses is thrown out of it by the momentum, the molasses being the heavier, just like cream gathers in the center because it is the lighter, and the milk which is the heavier gets onto the outer side of the separator.

That process, which is a modern process, has been improved, so that there is a great deal of very fine sugar that is produced by these centrifugal factories that will grade 98 and 99 and be 18 and 20 and 22 in color.

Now, that could find a market if it could be offered to the American people at a cheaper price than is our refined granulated sugar. There is no one in the Senate who does not remember years ago that we had different grades of sugar before the Dutch-standard monopoly was perfected. We had what were known as coffee sugars. I remember when I was a boy there was a coffee A and a coffee C. They were light-brown sugars; they had a little molasses in them, and they had a better flavor, indeed, than our refined sugars, because they had the molasses flavor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator remember how much they cost?

Mr. BRISTOW. They were much cheaper, probably 50 cents a hundred pounds, and sometimes 75 cents a hundred less than the refined. There was then a market for those sugars, and they would find a market now if the duty was assessed on the purity and not on the color, but they are lighter than 16, and so when a 17 sugar comes in—a sample of which I now hold in my hand—it pays just as high a duty as this granulated sugar [indicating] pays. So there is a penalty against this light-brown sugar coming in at all, a penalty of almost 20 cents a hundred pounds, and that keeps it out. Take that penalty off, and these sugars will find a market with the American public and the Sugar Trust will not get to handle them and add 75 cents a hundred to the price that the American people pay. That is the reason I am contending for taking the Dutch standard out of the sugar tariff.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question just for information? I do not know much about this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Is the process to which the Senator alluded as the centrifugal process for beet sugar mostly?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; beet sugar is a refined sugar in this country. We do not produce any raw beet sugar.

Mr. SWANSON. It is all one process?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is all one process, and they use the bone-black process.

Mr. SWANSON. Germany would be the country from which we would mostly get importations of refined sugar, would it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. We would get cane sugar from Cuba, from Java——

Mr. SWANSON. Cane sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. It would be all cane sugar.

Mr. SWANSON. Is this process employed in the case of cane sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. The centrifugal process is applied to cane sugars only. As I understand it, the beet-sugar process is a different process altogether. They take the impurities out of beet sugar, which are different kinds of impurities altogether from those in cane sugar. There is no molasses in beet sugar. Raw beet sugar has a bad flavor which they have to take out. They have to make it absolutely pure or it will not sell, as it would otherwise have a disagreeable taste.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the contention of the Senator from Kansas is that if the 16 Dutch color standard were eliminated white sugar that has gone through a process of refining could come in here and be sold according to the saccharine matter in it?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; for what it is worth.

Mr. SWANSON. But it is eliminated and can not be imported on account of that standard?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is exactly the fact. I regret to take such sharp issue with the Senator from Utah as I have done, but you can not get a law through the American Congress that takes from a monopoly its advantage without a controversy. I have been fighting the Dutch standard provision ever since I have been in the Senate. It has contributed to the profits of as infamous a gang of thieves as was ever sheltered by the American Government, and it is time that the Congrss was taking it out of the law. To try them before the courts, to undertake to convict them of the crime of robbing the Treasury, and still preserve in the law the paragraph that gave them the monopoly is a thing that I hope the American Congress will not continue any longer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that I believe I said a while ago that Mr. Bass, to whom I referred, lived in Porto Rico. I should have said in San Domingo.

Mr. BRISTOW. San Domingo. That can be changed accordingly.

Mr. President, I have not been very well for several days and I have been speaking now for about three hours. I dislike very much to ask the Senate to adjourn, but I can not finish to-night, and I should like to rest. The Senate can proceed with anything else it wishes and I will take this matter up the first thing to-morrow morning.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, in deference to the request of the Senator from Kansas, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 14, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 14, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of Local Division No. 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Providence, R. I., and a petition of the faculty of Lafayette College, of Easton, Pa., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred ot the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Elgin, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday rest bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of Laundry Workers' Union No. 109, of Belleville, Ill.; of the Trades and Labor Congress of Dubuque, Iowa; and of the Central Labor Union of Miami, Fla., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Water Users' Association of Sunnyside, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the act of June 17, 1902, relating to the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories for the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

BOSTON AND CHARLESTOWN COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 3023) to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the fifth clause of section 2527 of the Revised Statutes, describing the collection district of Boston and Charlestown, by striking out the words "and Charlestown" wherever they occur.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3027) placing Henry E. Rhoades, assistant engineer, United States Navy, on the retired list with an advanced rank; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 3028) to prevent floods and freshets originating on forest reserves and Indian reservations; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. BRYAN:

A bill (S. 3029) granting an increase of pension to Gomecindo Sallas; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRYAN (for Mr. FLETCHER):

A bill (S. 3030) granting a pension to John A. Lovett; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CULLOM:

A bill (S. 3031) granting an increase of pension to Henry L. Ketcham; and

A bill (S. 3032) granting an increase of pension to William H. Tillson (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 3033) granting an increase of pension to William L. Norton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3034) to improve the navigation of the Connecticut River between Hartford and Holyoke and to develop water power in connection therewith; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WETMORE:

A bill (S. 3035) to grant an honorable discharge to William T. Haskins, alias William Thomas (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SARAH E. EVANS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 104), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Sarah E. Evans, widow of John W. Evans, late a skilled laborer in the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ASSISTANT CLERKS TO COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 105), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, authorized to appoint two additional clerks at an annual salary of $1,800 each, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask that the document which I hold in my hand, which is a report of the British tariff commission in regard to the differences of interpretation of the most-favored-nation treaties in relation to the reciprocal agreement here, and which is very brief, may be printed as a document. (S. Doc. No. 66.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order is entered.

Mr. LODGE. Let me add that this copy belongs to the Senate library and is the only one on the files. I ask that it be not mutilated or destroyed in the printing, as it must be returned to the Senate library.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's request will be complied with.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho will state it.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the Evening Star, published in this city, Washington, on July 13, 1911, on the first page, third column, they have indulged in a misstatement that is inexcusable because they have the record, the official record of the statement, and there was no excuse for misstating it. They say in that misstatement:

Senator HEYBURN precipitated a discussion of the lost cause of the days of 1861 to 1865.

A minute later he began by remarking that he would oppose the employment of a horse by the Government that had hauled cannon for the southern army.

That is a deliberate falsehood. The RECORD would have shown them what I said. I said, and I quote the language:

I would not object to the Government employing an old horse which had been employed on the other side in the war, because the horse was not responsible.

The omission of the word "not" must have been deliberate, and I desire to make the record correct, so that it will always be a reproach for whoever is responsible.

That will be squibbed from one end of the country to the other, and it will result in my mail being increased to an inconvenient burden from all sorts of cranks, and I will have to endure that. But I hope that those who profess to report the proceedings of the Senate may find some reproach in the statement that it was a falsehood without justification.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the calendar, which is not long, may be allowed to go on for a few minutes, that we may dispose of unobjected matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412, the reciprocity bill.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Georgia has asked that we proceed to the consideration of the calendar, under Rule VIII, for a few minutes.

Mr. BACON. For the consideration of unobjected cases only, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah withdraw his motion?

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw the motion and allow the calendar to be considered.

Mr. PENROSE. Only for unobjected cases.

Mr. SMOOT. It is understood that only unobjected cases will be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is always understood. The first bill on the calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as first in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. CURTIS. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has a pending amendment. I think it would be unfair to take up the bill in his absence. I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 1899) to repeal a portion of an act heretofore passed relating to the alienation of the title of the United States to land in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected" was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 2653) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," was announced as next in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has an amendment which he proposes to offer to this bill, and in his absence I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the same request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1898) providing for the protection of the interests of the United States in lands and waters comprising any part of the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, and lands adjacent thereto, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I make the same request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. There is an amendment pending to the bill, and the chairman of the committee is not here. So I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

MATTHEW LOGAN.

The bill (S. 270) for the relief of Matthew Logan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Matthew Logan shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Battery H, First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteer Light Artillery, on the 25th day of July, 1865. But no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am anxious to have an early vote and had expected to ask unanimous consent to set a day for the consideration of the joint resolution providing for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona, but I understand that some arrangement is being evolved which comprehends a final vote on the measure soon, and I therefore ask that it may go over for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution has gone over.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT EMPLOYMENT.

The bill (S. 2877) amending section 67 of the act approved March 3, 1911, to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 67 of the act approved March 3, 1911, to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary by adding at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That no such person at present holding a position or employment in a circuit court shall be debarred from similar appointment or employment in the district court succeeding to such circuit court jurisdiction.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFEDERATE MONUMENT IN VICKSBURG NATIONAL MILITARY PARK.

The bill (S. 2925) providing for a Confederate naval monument in the Vicksburg National Military Park was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over. This completes the calendar.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in pursuance of the notice given on yesterday I now move an amendment to the rules, with a view to having it referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment to the rules, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

No Senator having the floor in debate shall permit another Senator to interrupt him, without the consent of the Senate, except for the bona fide purpose of asking a question, or for the purpose of correcting a misstatement, and not for the purpose of discussion or argument. If any Senator shall interrupt another Senator, except as herein provided, any Senator may call him to order; and when a Senator is thus called to order he shall sit down and not proceed with said interruption without the leave of the Senate which, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed with said interruption, which motion shall be decided without debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the rule now, is it not? It requires unanimous consent for a Senator to yield to anyone.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it does, under the rules.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I am replying to the Senator's inquiry, and I can not hear him clearly. I understood the Senator from Idaho to inquire if this prevented a Senator's yielding except by unanimous consent. Is that the inquiry of the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Under the present rules no Senator can yield to another without unanimous consent, or against the objection of anyone.

Mr. BACON. On the contrary, Mr. President, I think Rule XIX contemplates that he can yield with the consent of the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. We discussed that two years ago here at some length. I thought the rule was made plain.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment, as I stated in the notice given on yesterday in compliance with the requirement of the rule that when there is an amendment proposed the purpose of it shall be stated, is to try if possible to restore the Senate to the decorum and methods of debate which up to a very recent past have always characterized the proceedings in this body. It must be apparent to every Senator that we have far departed from the ordinary methods of a deliberative body. No Senator can possibly get up and make a speech with any degree of connectedness, unless perhaps he has a written speech, and in the majority of instances the Senator who has a written speech is permitted to deliver it without interruption because in the majority of instances nobody listens to the speech and consequently nobody interrupts. But in anything which excites any interest at all it is impossible for any Senator, as a general rule, to present a proposition with any degree of continuity. As soon as he has begun to develop his thought some Senator who may have an idea to the contrary, instead of waiting until the Senator has completed his speech and then taking the floor in his own right and endeavoring to answer him, before the sentence can be completed, interrupts him, and not simply with an inquiry or a correction, both of which interruptions are proper, but with an interruption designed to take issue with him and to begin an argument. The interrupting Senator interrupts with a sentence; the Senator who has the floor replies with a sentence; the interrupting Senator rejoins, and page after page of the RECORD is taken up not with the statement or any continuous argument but with these interjected and reciprocal contentions and arguments, which, as I said yesterday, make the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD appear more like the page of a sensational novel, where there are animated conversations, than like the page of the RECORD of the dignified and serious debate of a deliberative body.

I confess, Mr. President, to being myself a sinner, and therefore I do not wish to be understood in any manner as finding any fault with others that I do not confess to myself, though I must say that I frequently restrain myself when I would like to take part in debates because of the fact that they are so irregular, so disjointed, so interjectory that there is no satisfaction in a Senator attempting to participate in the debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BACON. I will yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may break the contemplated rule now, may I ask the Senator if he believes that in the practical application of his new rule he will gain anything? If I interrupt the Senator and he consents to the interruption, is it very likely that anyone else will object to it, and will we not have substantially the same conditions that we are now laboring under?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course no rule upon this subject can be efficacious and no reform can be had in what I consider to be an exceedingly unfortunate practice in the Senate unless Senators themselves, by reason of the rule, recognize the propriety of its observance.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator if his rule provides that before an interruption can be had the Chair will have to submit the question of interruption to the Senator to ascertain whether there is objection by any Senator?

Mr. BACON. No; Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Is that in the rule which the Senator proposes?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, the very questions he is asking me illustrate the necessity of some such rule. I was proceeding, if I be able to do it, to cover the very ground the Senator is now asking about. That is the trouble. It is that no Senator can make any statement upon the floor, even to develop his thought, before a Senator, instead of waiting until he has finished and then presenting his thought, will interrupt him and break it up to an extent that it is absolutely impossible to present any continuity of idea on any subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true. I will not break in on the Senator, if he will make that point clear to us.

Mr. BACON. That is an illustration again of what I was going to say. The practice of the Senate is such that a Senator is not able himself to observe the rule, because the interruptions are so continuous, so insistent, that no Senator can raise the least objection to an interruption but what he has a reply, just such as the Senator from North Dakota has just given me, putting the Senator in a position of either abandoning the observance of the decorum of the Senate, so far as he is concerned, and the observance of the rule which requires him to keep the floor, or else appearing himself to be discourteous, as the Senator has just made me appear. There is an illustration of it; and so it goes all the time.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of this rule. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether it would not be well to strike out the words "bona fide," so as to read "except for the purpose of asking a question." It conveys the idea of an imputation, and is not language altogether appropriate to the rules of the Senate. The other is more direct and forcible, it seems to me. If the Senator has no objection, I suggest that the words "bona fide" be stricken out.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the matter is not now before the Senate for action. It is only before the Senate for reference.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent that the words I have indicated be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the words to which he refers be stricken out.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as I have stated, the amendment is not now before the Senate for action. This again illustrates the habit we have grown into that each Senator, as he has an idea presented to his mind on any subject that may be under consideration, is not content to wait until he has an opportunity to take the floor to present it, but he must present it at the instant, and with the consequence that there are scarcely—you may take the RECORD up, Mr. President; you will find that to be the case—there are scarcely 3 inches of any page where any Senator proceeds in continuous expression, but it is interjected with every possible interruption that another Senator may be influenced to make by an idea which occurs to him at the moment.

The present rule is that a Senator shall not interrupt another without his consent. That rule is practically null; the Chair is unable to enforce the rule; the present occupant of the chair has been diligent and active and insistent in the effort to enforce it, and yet the disregard of Senators of that rule is such that it is an impossibility, practically, to enforce it. I think I may call every Senator within the sound of my voice to testify to the correctness of that statement. A Senator gets up to interrupt another Senator, who expresses his indisposition to be interrupted. That ought to be sufficient; but, on the contrary, when a Senator expresses his disinclination to be interrupted, at once the Senator who seeks to interrupt insists upon it, and even with the positive injunction on the part of the Chair that a certain Senator has the floor and has indicated a disinclination to be interrupted, a Senator will persist and say, "I only want to ask the Senator so and so," and persists in asking it, thus, by indirection, violating the rule. So, I say, the rule is absolutely null; you might as well have no such rule as that which is now Rule XIX, because it is so utterly disregarded.

As I said just now, the rule is made null by two influences. First, by the disregard of the interrupting Senator; and, second, by the unwillingness of a Senator who is occupying the floor to be put in the position of being discourteous in refusing to submit to the interruption.

So far as the terms of my proposed rule are concerned, I do not mean to say that this is the rule that should be adopted; I do not know that it is. A better rule may be framed, but even if this were adopted possibly the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is a proper one, and there may be others. But I thought it proper that the attention of the Senate should be called to this matter, that we should endeavor, if possible, to restore this high body to a habit of decorum and orderly method of debate which is consistent with the dignity and authority and place of this body. I do not propose to go into a discussion in detail now. I only say this with a view, if possible, of having Senators think about it. Let us do something.

The other rule to which I had occasion to refer is this: There is no doubt about the parliamentary rule that when a Senator on the floor yields to another for the purpose of discussing a question he has, in fact, surrendered the floor; that is a parliamentary rule, and yet we see this here continuously. A Senator takes the floor; he submits to an interruption, and another Senator will go on as long as the other Senator will permit, and when he gets through the Senator having the floor holds the floor and some other Senator asks him to yield to him, and he yields to him; and I have seen Senators hold the floor here for an hour, themselves not speaking, but practically farming out the time of the Senate, which is improper.

As to the practical working of this proposed rule, I do not know that it is the proper remedy. I am simply trying to find a remedy; I am simply trying to interest Senators in recognition of the fact that there should be a remedy.

Mr. President, it is a matter of current comment, not simply here but in the country, among men of thought and observation and respect and care and consideration for the dignity of this body, that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as it now appears, all hashed up by men engaged not in debate but, as I said yesterday, like men jowering upon a street corner—it is a matter of comment in the country that it is no longer a credit to this body that such should be the case.

We are all of us at fault; I am as much as anybody else, and I am not lecturing anyone; but I realize that something should be done, and I hope that other Senators may take a similar view.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I want to express a feeling of gratitude to the Senator from Georgia for bringing up this subject. For a long time it has been a matter of common conversation in the Senate and in the cloakrooms, and there has been a general expression on the part of Senators, old and young, to the effect that we have gradually fallen into bad habits in our debate and that there has been a progressive deterioration of method. The difficulty of getting out of the habit of substituting mere wrangling for serious debate has been that the burden in every case is thrown upon one individual in his relation to one other individual, and when the request is made for a Senator to yield it is assumed that it would be invidious for him to refuse; and he yielding, which, under the rule, can be only for a question, has gradually come to be assumed to be a yielding for the purpose of making a speech. So that, as has been remarked upon the floor here, the only Senator not entitled to speak is the Senator having the floor.

I think, whether the rule proposed by the Senator from Georgia is new or not, whether or not there now exists substantially the same rule by inference from the language we have in our printed rules, that it is very desirable that the Members of the Senate shall have brought sharply to their attention all at one time the fact that we have been slipping into loose and undesirable habits in the course of our debate, and that we ought to pull ourselves up and get out of it, so that it will not be left for one individual to do something which seems unfriendly or discourteous to another individual. We can not get out of a bad habit in that way. The only way to get out of a bad habit is to get out of it altogether.

I have been watching the progressive character of this habit. It has come now to be so that instead of the speaker exercising the option to yield or not to yield, if he does not yield, he finds the Senator who proposes to enter intervene in his speech complaining that there is a violation of the rules and practices of the Senate against him. I have heard within a few weeks on this floor a Senator complain that because the Senator holding the floor insisted upon going on with his argument and did not assent to have another Senator come in to make an argument the rules and practices of the Senate were being violated to his detriment. I have observed here within a few weeks a Senator rise and interrupt and say the reason why he interrupted was that he thought a different argument that he had had in his mind ought to go to the country with the argument being made by the Senator who had the floor. Certainly that is going far beyond the reasonable rule or the letter of the rule which forbids an interruption except for a question; but we are gradually falling into the habit of thinking that the rule is that whenever a Senator who has the floor has said something which another Senator thinks ought to be answered the other Senator has a right to take the floor and make the answer then and there. Of course that results in the destruction of all deliberate debate. I think we ought to pull ourselves out of the bad habits we have fallen into, and I am grateful to the Senator from Georgia for bringing up the matter in the resolution he has proposed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the possession of the floor with the right to address the Senate, which is conferred by the recognition of the Chair, is a very valuable and important right. I have watched in the years I have been in the Senate the gradual relaxation of the rule which is designed to protect that right. When I first entered the Senate I recall very well that on the first occasion when I made a serious and carefully prepared speech, by the advice of an older Senator of long experience in this Chamber, I said when I began that I should be obliged if I might be permitted to proceed without interruption; that after I had finished what I had prepared I should, of course, be very glad to answer any question, if it were within my power to do so. Similar requests were constantly made and were never, so far as I know, otherwise than scrupulously observed. Within a short time I have seen the habit grow up here of an absolute disregard of such a request, even when it was specifically made; and, as the Senator from New York has pointed out, we have so reversed the whole principle on which the rule is based and every theory and doctrine of debate, that we have now come to the point where it appears that if the Senator in possession of the floor declines to yield, he is held by many other Senators to be violating some right of theirs; he is held to be doing something discourteous. He is doing nothing discourteous and nothing invidious. While he is in possession of the floor, it is his privilege to present his views to the Senate in such manner as he sees fit. But no man likes to be subjected to such criticism as that on the part of his associates.

The only way, in my judgment, to restore what I consider the proper methods of conducting debate in the Senate of the United States is in some way to relieve the Senator who holds the floor from what has come almost to be the odium of declining an interruption. It should not rest solely upon his shoulders. It should be possible for any Senator to protect the order and the decorum of debate.

I am certain, Mr. President, that adherence to such a rule as is now proposed will not only improve the character of our debates, but I am certain it will facilitate the transaction of business; and that we shall not, as is now the habit, be drawn off from the subject under discussion to a number of irrelevant matters, which the Senator speaking may have merely alluded to in passing. I hope, Mr. President, that some amendment to the rules of the character of that submitted by the Senator from Georgia will be taken up by the Committee on Rules at once and presented to the Senate, and that we may have action upon it.

The amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Georgia seems to me a very good one, but I am not undertaking now to say just what the new rule should be. There should be, however, some change; and immediate change I think is imperative. I can only join with the Senator from New York in saying that I am very much obliged to the Senator from Georgia for having taken the trouble to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate, and I hope it will receive the immediate attention of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with the attitude of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I should like to make a suggestion to him. As I understand parliamentary law to-day, the utmost that a Senator who has obtained recognition can do in his own behalf is to yield for a question, and if any other Senator, even with the consent of the Senator having the floor, undertakes to interject a speech or take the time of the Senate, it is now in the power of any Senator to rise to a point of order. Therefore, as I understand the parliamentary law, there is no need of a change in the rule. The only need is, first, self-restraint upon the part of all of us, because, with very rare exceptions, we are all more or less guilty; and, second, for Senators under the present rule, when it is being abused and the Senator having the floor is put in an unfair attitude, to protect him against the suggestion that he is not generous in yielding to interruptions, by themselves making the point of order, if the Senator who interrupts transcends the mere matter of an inquiry. So, I think the remedy is clearly within our own hands.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, it seems from what has been said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that this degeneracy on the part of the Senate is of late occurrence. I am afraid it may be inferred from that that the new Senators are responsible for this condition. For myself, I desire to say that as a new Senator I am in entire sympathy with the effort to amend the rules in some way along the lines suggested by the Senator from Georgia. Personally, I have no reason to complain. I have been treated on the floor of the Senate with the utmost courtesy on the part of all members of this body; but I have been utterly amazed since I have been here at the extent to which interruptions have gone. I think I may truthfully say that I have seen Senators take the floor here and more than half of the time they occupied the floor was taken up by speeches of other Senators, and it is almost impossible to follow the continuity of the argument of the Senator who has the floor. There should be some remedy for a condition of this kind. It might very well come from the self-restraint of Senators themselves, but that does not seem to be sufficient; and I simply wanted to say, as a new Senator, that I am in entire sympathy with the effort to overcome the habit which is now very largely controlling the Senate in this respect.

Mr. BACON. I simply want to say that there is no possible suggestion that the unfortunate condition or habit into which we have fallen is due to new Members of the Senate, as the Senator from California terms them. It is a habit which has been growing for years. I will say that some of the worst offenders now in the Senate are among the older Members of the Senate, and I will not exclude myself.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Georgia will find the Senate generally in harmony with the object to be attained by the new rule. But I want to submit to the Senator that I am afraid his exception in his rule is made not only broader than the rule itself, but is made broader than the present rule. Under the rule we have this provision:

> No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent.

Now, there is no exception to that. The purpose for which the interruption may be had is not mentioned, but it is left entirely with the Senator whether he consents to be interrupted for one purpose or another purpose, so far as the rule is concerned.

The Senator's amendment provides that—> no Senator having the floor in debate shall permit another Senator to interrupt him without the consent of the Senate except—giving an implied exception, and in that implied exception an implied right to interrupt for the bona fide purpose of asking a question, which is not very pernicious in itself, but also for the further purpose of correcting a mistake.

Now, I submit to the Senator from Georgia that every interruption has as its basis the desire to ask a bona fide question, and also if there is any additional reason, the reason is for the purpose of correcting a mistake. Under the exception there is an implication that a Senator may go into an argument for the purpose of correcting the mistake. And it leaves the Senator who has the floor exactly in the same condition or position that he would be if we had no such rule.

I am going to wait until I can obviate another matter; and that is for the attention of the Senator who is addressed, which I think is also a pretty good rule.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. It was not a voluntary diversion on my part.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am satisfied of that. But I want to submit to the Senator if it would not be well to amend his own proposition by striking out of it that portion which refers to an interruption for the purpose of correcting a mistake.

The Senator would have ample opportunity in his own time to correct a mistake, and by impliedly giving the right to interrupt for that purpose it impliedly gives the right to go into debate upon that subject.

I further want to suggest to the Senator, in order to secure the end desired, if it would not be better in the first line of his amendment, instead of saying "No Senator having the floor in debate shall permit," because it is an addition; he already has the right to permit it, under certain circumstances—to say that the Chair shall not permit another Senator to interrupt him except for the purpose of a question or for the purpose of correcting what the Senator interrupting might, in his mind, believe to be a misstatement.

Mr. BACON. I think all of these suggestions are most valuable, and I would be very glad if other Senators would also turn the matter in their minds and make suggestions, in order that we may perfect a rule which shall protect the Senate against what I think, in all respect to all of us, is a pernicious habit.

I do not undertake myself now to offer any amendments or to consent to any, because the amendment necessarily goes to the Committee on Rules, and there it will doubtless have very careful attention. I hope Senators will suggest to the Committee on Rules such amendments as they think should be made. I did not myself imagine that the rule as drawn by me was by any means perfect.

I simply drew a rule which should be a basis for action, my main purpose being to bring it to the attention of the Senate and to invoke the most earnest and serious thought and consideration of the Senate to cure what I think is an evil far beyond a mere matter of formality. It goes to the very root of the efficiency of this body. I myself shall be more than happy to conform to any suggestion which shall be made and which shall be shown to be proper.

I think the suggestions made by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the suggestions made by the Senator from North Dakota are most valuable, and I am inclined to think they are both of them correct. But I suppose it would be better to leave it as it is to go to the Committee on Rules, and have the amendments to the proposed amendment put in form by them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the proposed amendment is referred to the Committee on Rules.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Kansas for a moment while I present certain amendments to the bill under consideration. One of them is a provision of Schedule C, known as the metal schedule. The other is a revision of that paragraph of Schedule J which relates to oilcloth and linoleum. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table, and inasmuch as they are short that they also be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that course will be followed.

The amendments referred to are as follows:

Amendment to the amendments proposed by Mr. CUMMINS to the bill H. R. 4412. Add a section, as follows:

"The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended by striking out paragraph 121 of Schedule C thereof and inserting the following:

"121. Beams, girders, joists, angles, car-truck channels, T. T. columns and posts, or parts or sections of columns and posts, deck and bulb beams and building forms, together with all other structural shapes of iron or steel, whether plain, punched, or fitted for use, or whether assembled and manufactured, three-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

"The said Schedule C in the act aforesaid, being paragraphs 117 to 199, both inclusive, is hereby further amended as follows, to wit:

"From and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles mentioned in the several paragraphs of said Schedule C, when imported from any foreign country into the United States, or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), 60 per cent only of the rates of duty which are in and by said paragraphs of said schedule prescribed; but the foregoing shall not apply to paragraph 121, which is hereinbefore repealed and a substitute reenacted therefor."

Amendment to the amendments proposed by Mr. CUMMINS to the bill H. R. 4412. Add a section, as follows:

"The act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' is hereby amended by striking out paragraph 347 of Schedule J of said act and substituting therefor the following, as paragraph 347:

"347. Oilcloth for floors, linoleum, corticene, and all the fabrics or covering for floors made in part of oil or any similar product, whether plain, stamped, painted or printed, or the composition of which forms designs or patterns, whether inlaid or otherwise by whatever name known; and cork carpets, cork mats, oilcloth or corticene mats, waterproof cloth, composed of cotton or other vegetable fiber, whether composed in part of india rubber or otherwise, 40 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. BRISTOW. In the discussion yesterday afternoon the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] referred to a Mr. Bass, stating that he was from Porto Rico. Afterwards the Senator corrected the statement as to his residence and stated, I believe, that he was from San Dqmingo, if I recollect rightly.

The Senator from Utah also stated in the controversy that was going on between him and myself that the centrifugal sugar paid the full duty of $1.90, and I made the remark that after reflection I was confident the Senator would not contend that that statement was correct, and I inquire of him this morning if he now concedes that all centrifugal sugars do not pay the full duty of $1.90?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to get into any argument on this point, but since he asks me the question I am going to say this: That where sugars are above 16 Dutch standard, if they have been refined by centrifugal, I think they are refined sugars.

Mr. BRISTOW. And they pay the $1.90.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the point of order that Senators on this side are not able to hear the conversation going on on the other side of the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will say to the Senator that he is unable to do anything to increase the volume of sound or to accentuate the Senator's acuteness of hearing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it would help matters if Senators would address the Chair instead of each other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so, too. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator stated that centrifugal sugars above 16 Dutch standard in color pay the full duty. He also will admit this morning, I am very confident, that centrifugal sugars not above 16 Dutch standard, regardless of their saccharine purity by the polariscope test, do not pay the $1.90. Am I right about that?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I stated yesterday, and I have not changed my mind at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will read to the Senator, to refresh his mind, just what he stated yesterday. I now read from the reporter's transcript of yesterday's proceedings:

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator consider the centrifugal process a process of refining?—

I should like the attention of the Senator, because I am reading from the reporter's transcript—

I should like the Senator to answer that question, if he will. Does the Senator consider the centrifugal method a process of refining?

Mr. SMOOT. I consider the centrifugal process a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator claim, then——

Mr. SMOOT. And I consider also that the washing of sugar is a process of refining.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment, now. The Senator said that he considered the centrifugal process a process of refining. Does the Senator claim that all of the centrifugal sugars pay $1.90 duty?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think they do.

Mr. BRISTOW. All centrifugal sugars?

Mr. SMOOT. All centrifugal sugars. There are sugars that come from the Philippine Islands, of course, that now come in here free.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator think that all centrifugal sugar which comes from Cuba pays $1.90 duty less 20 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that all centrifugal sugar is in the shape of refined sugar, and all sugar that has gone through that process pays that amount.

Mr. BRISTOW. Through the centrifugal process?

Mr. SMOOT. Through the centrifugal process.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, the Senator, of course, will consider this tomorrow and say that he was mistaken, because he certainly is.

Now, I understand the Senator to say centrifugal sugars that are not above 16 Dutch standard do not pay the $1.90?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will remember, we were at the time talking about sugars below 16 Dutch standard. We were discussing that question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I renew my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will please speak so that other Senators than the Senator to whom he is directly addressing his remarks can hear.

Mr. SMOOT. We were discussing that question, and after the discussion of it, as has just been read——

Mr. BACON. I am going to make another point of order, at the risk of being disagreeable. I say it is not in order for the Senator from Utah to enter into a discussion with the Senator from Kansas while the Senator from Kansas has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. It can only be done upon the theory of the unanimous consent of the Senate, and in the face of a single objection it can not be done.

Mr. SMOOT. All I wish to say——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection is made. The Senator from Utah is out of order. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. I inquire of the Senator from Georgia if he has any objection to the Senator from Utah making a direct answer to the question that I asked him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor, and objection has been made to farming out his time to others.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I raise the question of order that it is not competent for the Senator from Kansas to have interjected in his remarks any observations by the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the Senator from Kansas go on and make his speech.

Mr. BRISTOW. I regret very much that the Senator from Utah has escaped being compelled to admit that he was absolutely wrong yesterday in his declaration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hardly thinks that that is a parliamentary statement, although no Senator has raised a point of order. That statement is a violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I beg the Senator's pardon if I have violated the rules. I stated that the Senator from Utah was absolutely mistaken yesterday. Is that in violation of the rules of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule of the Senate is that no conduct shall be imputed to any Senator unbecoming a gentleman. It strikes the Chair that imputing to another Senator a statement that is absolutely erroneous is not alleging that he is a gentleman.

Mr. BRISTOW. I certainly think that the Chair misconstrued the statement that I made. My statement was, if I remember it, that the Senator from Utah had been relieved by the objection of the Senators from Georgia and New York from admitting that the statement which he made yesterday was not correct, which I think the Senator from Utah would have done if I had been permitted to pursue the inquiry. I hope that it is not a violation of the rules of the Senate to make a statement like that, which is a plain statement of fact, and does not impute any dishonorable motive to anybody, but a lack of accurate information.

I will now undertake to discuss the amendment which I have offered and show reasons, if I can, why it should be adopted as a part of this bill.

The amendment first provides for reducing the duty on refined sugar from $1.90 per hundred to $1.75½, first by taking off the differential. As was stated yesterday, the duty on sugar is made up by levying a tax of 95 cents per hundred on sugar that tests 75 degrees pure by the polariscope test, and for each additional degree of purity 3½ cents per hundred is added, making the maximum duty on raw sugar $1.82½.

But there is another provision in the law which provides that sugar which is above No. 16 Dutch standard in color shall pay a duty of $1.90 per hundred regardless of its saccharine purity. So when the sugar in the process of manufacturing becomes whitened until its color is above No. 16, which is the color of the bottle of sugar I hold in my hand [indicating], when the color becomes lighter than that sample, the duty then is assessed at $1.90 regardless of its purity, even if it is only 90 per cent pure by the polariscope test.

If 90 per cent pure the duty, if the Dutch standard provision was taken out, would be 35 cents less than $1.82½, or $1.47½, but being lighter than 16 it is assessed, instead of $1.47½, at $1.90. The difference in the duty is so much that light sugars are barred from coming into the market except in the refined state, and the duty on the refined sugar is so high that it is prohibitive and prevents importation.

So that this device that we discussed so much yesterday is used to prevent light-brown sugar from being sold by the manufacturers to the American public direct, because that which is No. 16 in color is too dark to meet the taste of the American people for their household uses.

Pure sugar refined by the centrifugal process is 100. If it is 100 it is pure; it has no foreign substance. It is as pure as if it was passed through the refineries which use a process known as the bone-black process. The bone-black process takes out all of the molasses and leaves the sugar a blue white in color. The refiners claim that this 7½ cents is the protection they receive for refining as against the foreign refiners.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the development of the sugar business since the Dingley law was passed, for the present law is the same as the Dingley law, except that the duty on refined sugar was reduced in the Payne-Aldrich bill from $1.95 to $1.90. The duty on raw sugar was left the same. At the time the Dingley law was passed we were receiving full-duty-paid sugar from all countries in the world except Hawaii. Hawaii then had free sugar, but all other sugars that came into the American market paid the duty as prescribed, and the market standard for fixing the value of the sugar is 96° pure by the polariscope test and not above 16 Dutch standard in color. That is, the market quotations on all raw sugars that come to this country are based on 96°, tested by the polariscope, and color not above 16 Dutch standard. Every country, except Hawaii, from which sugar was then purchased by the American refiners paid a duty of $1.68½ on 96° sugar that was not above 16 Dutch standard, and 51 per cent of our consumption of sugar paid that duty—$1.68½ per hundred pounds.

The refineries then had the differential of 12½ cents between pure raw sugar and refined sugar, though there was no difference in the purity of the sugar. The only difference is a slight shade of color, the refined being a bluish white. But the refineries do not import the pure raw sugar to refine it; they import sugars varying in purity from 75 degrees up to 96. Very little of it indeed is purchased at above 96 degrees. The great bulk of our importations test 95 by the polariscope and are not above 16 in color. That is because of a very interesting device adopted by the refiners. If a cargo of sugar should come to New York, and that sugar was 96 in purity and 16 in color, we will say that, including the duty, a price of $3.90 a hundred would be paid for it. The duty would be $1.34½ if it was from Cuba, where most of our sugars come from, and so the price the producer would receive would be $2.55½.

Now, if it was 97 degrees pure instead of 96, the owner of the sugar would receive 3⅛ cents more per hundred than if it had been 96; that is, for each additional degree above 96 the refiners pay him 3½ cents more per hundred pounds, but he would have to pay the 3½ cents additional duty—that is, he would lose three-eighths of a cent per hundred because it was 1 degree above 96 in purity. So the producer would not want his sugar to test above 96. He would not want it to test as this bottle does, which I have now, 98, or as this does [indicating], 99, because it would cost him 3½ cents more per hundred in duty for each additional degree in purity, and he would get only 3⅛ cents per hundred more for his sugar.

If it tested less than 96, down to 94, then he would receive 6¼ cents less per hundred pounds for it for each degree below 96. In order that that may be clear, I will say, if it tested less than 96 there would be deducted from his price 6¼ cents per hundred pounds for each degree down to 94, and if it tested less than 94, then there would be deducted 9⅜ cents per hundred pounds. So you will see that the sugar producer must as nearly as possible make all of his sugars test 96 or 95 and not above 16 in color, because if it tests less than 96 he is penalized for its impurity; if it tests more than 96 he is penalized by an excessive duty; and if it is above 16 in color he is penalized by more than 20 cents additional duty because of its light color. The result has been that all our importations have practically been 95 in purity and not above 16 in color. So that last year of all the sugar imported about 80 per cent tested 95 in purity and not above 16 in color, and less than 1 per cent, as I remember, was above 16 in color and above 96 in purity. Now, the Senate will see that, as a matter of fact, instead of the importers paying a duty of $1.82½——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. GORE. I want to ask the Senator how much that sugar weighed a pound at the customhouse?

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not advised as to that. The result has been that the actual duty paid by the importers is not $1.82½, but about $1.65 a hundred, or 25 cents a hundred less than the present duty on the refiner's product, so that while in theory the refiners have a differential of but 7½ cents, as a matter of fact, under the Dingley law they had a differential of 30 cents and under the present law 25 cents. This is a technical discussion, but I think that as Senators follow it it will become more interesting as we get into the intricacies of the sugar tariff.

Every pound of imported sugar paid the full duty coming from all the countries except Hawaii in 1897, when the Dingley law was passed. Some years after that law was passed—to be accurate, July 25, 1901—Porto Rican sugars were admitted free of duty, so that the refiners had another field in addition to Hawaii from which to buy their raw sugar and pay no duty. March 8, 1902, sugar was admitted from the Philippines at a reduction of 25 per cent from the duty; but that was a matter of little consequence, because very little sugar has come from the Philippine Islands. But whatever the importation, there was that much of a reduction of the duty on raw sugar.

On December 27, 1903, the Cuban reciprocity agreement was entered into by which the Cuban planters were given a reduction of 20 per cent from the duty, reducing the duty on 96° sugar, which is the basis of all purchases, from $1.68¾ to $1.348. So since December 27, 1903, the refiners of this country have purchased Cuban sugar testing 96°, upon which they paid a duty of $1.68¾ when the Dingley law was passed, but now pay only $1.348.

This differential which the sugar refiners then had on pure 100° sugar was the difference between $1.82½, the maximum duty on raw sugar, and $1.95, the duty on refined sugar. By the Cuban treaty this differential was increased by a 20 per cent reduction of the duty on Cugan sugars, thereby reducing the maximum duty on raw sugar from Cuba from $1.82½ to $1.46, making the differential 49 cents per hundred pounds. When the Payne-Aldrich bill became a law the duty on refined sugar was reduced from $1.95 to $1.90, leaving the differential on Cuban sugar since that date 44 cents per hundred. I have shown, however, that the differential, based upon actual importations was, prior to that time, 25 cents—not 12½ cents—and since that time it is the difference between $1.348, the duty actually paid upon importations, and $1.90, or about 55 cents per hundred pounds. That 60 cents a hundred pounds is a great deal more than the entire cost of refining. There is no evidence that it costs as much as 60 cents a hundred pounds to refine sugar, except a statement at one time made by Mr. Havemeyer. The result has been that this 20 per cent reduction in duty has enabled the sugar refiners to buy their sugar in Cuba for about 34 cents a hundred less—that is, the amount of the 20 per cent reduction in duty—than they did before. They have gotten the advantage of the reduction of the duty; the Cuban has not received any more for his sugar; and the American consuming public has not received the advantage of that reduction. I make that statement and challenge any man to contradict it.

So the result of Cuban reciprocity, so far as sugar is concerned, was to take out of the Treasury of the United States about $10,000,000 a year and put it into the profits of the sugar refiners of the United States. In this statement I am not alleging what I think will happen if a pending bill becomes a law; I am not theorizing on what will come to pass or speculating on what will happen to the price of wheat, but I am relating what the records show has happened in the matter of sugar.

I should qualify the remark I have made that the American consumers have not received any advantage at all, for they did receive some. I have gone to the trouble of ascertaining the average price of refined sugar, which is the kind the American people use, in Europe for five years prior to the reciprocity treaty with Cuba and five years subsequent to the reciprocity treaty with Cuba, and I have compared those prices with the prices of refined sugar in the United States five years prior to the Cuban reciprocity treaty and five years after the Cuban reciprocity treaty, and I will give you the differences. The difference between the Hamburg price of refined sugar for the first five-year period and the last five-year period was 3 cents a hundred pounds; that is, the Hamburg price of refined sugar for the five years after the treaty was 3 cents per hundred pounds less than for the five years preceding the treaty, while the New York price of refined sugar for the last five years was 4.7 cents per hundred pounds less, making a net reduction in the price of refined sugar in the United States for the five years after the Cuban reciprocity treaty of 1.7 cents per hundred pounds less than it was during the five years preceding, as compared with the European or world market. This surely demonstrates that the American people got a reduction in the price of their sugar of only 1.7 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. McCUMBER. The people or the middlemen?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is the wholesale price. Of course ultimately the consumer probably might have gotten some of it. The refiners were able to purchase their sugars for about 34 cents per hundred pounds less from the Cubans—at least 30 cents per hundred pounds less—while the public got, or as the Senator from North Dakota states the wholesalers got, their sugar from the refiners for only 1.7 cents per hundred pounds less.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator if he could in this connection give us the difference between the wholesale price of sugar in Europe and in the United States during the period he has just covered by his previous figures?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, I can.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator would do so, if he can do it without interrupting his argument.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can give the details.

Mr. REED. I hope we shall have them before the Senator concludes, at any rate.

Mr. BRISTOW. I shall be glad to include them in my remarks and submit a table which I have here, giving the average price for each year.

For the information of the Senator from Missouri I will now say that for 1899 the New York price was $4.91⅞ per hundred pounds—that is the wholesale price of refined sugar—the Hamburg price was $2.53, a difference of $2.38⅜; and it runs along varying somewhat in the different years:

Mr. REED. Just one matter further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. REED. Could the Senator give us the difference in the retail price—the price paid by the consumer in each country?

Mr. BRISTOW. The price paid by the consumers in this country is very much less than that paid in European countries. Europe has a very interesting way of taxing sugar. They impose in almost every European country an internal-revenue tax on their sugar similar to our taxes on beer and whisky. The wholesale price of sugar in Spain is 9 cents a pound; in Italy it is over 11 cents a pound. I do not now remember just what the price is in Germany, but I think it is over 5 cents—5 or 6 cents. I do not know what it is retailed for in those countries, but the retailer's profit would be added to the above figures.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the price in England?

Mr. BRISTOW. England does not levy a consumption tax, as other European countries do, but levies a revenue duty. The price is less than in this country, because the duty on sugar is much less in England than in our country. The maximum English duty is about 44 cents a hundredweight of 112 pounds, or about 40 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. DIXON. How is the wholesale price of sugar 5 or 6 cents a pound in Germany and yet in Hamburg only 2.53, as I understood the Senator?

Mr. BRISTOW. I was speaking of the export price in Germany. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked me what was the retail price paid by the consumers in Germany.

Mr. REED. The Senator inadvertently used the word "wholesale," I think, instead of "retail" in his last answer.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator said "wholesale" when he meant "retail."

Mr. BRISTOW. I was speaking of the wholesale price in my answer to the Senator from Missouri. I will say to the Senator from Montana that the prices I quoted were export prices. The reason the wholesale price in these European countries is so much more than the export price is because of the internal-consumption tax, and that tax is not levied on exported sugar. The difference in the export price and the domestic wholesale price is, I suppose, approximately the amount of the local-consumption tax.

Now, to proceed, when the Dingley law was passed we were paying duty on a basis of $1.68 for 96 test per 100 pounds on 51 per cent of all the sugar consumed. Last year, 1910, instead of importing 51 per cent paying the full duty, we imported only 5 per cent of our consumption upon which the full duty was paid. For the last fiscal year there were only 213,000 tons of raw sugar imported into the United States that paid the full duty. The remainder of the sugar which we consumed, which was 3,467,000 short tons, was produced at home or imported from the countries where now no duty is paid, or from Cuba, where the duty has been reduced 20 per cent.

So, it clearly appears that during the years that have followed since the Dingley law was passed there has been a gradual reduction in the amount of duty that was required to be paid by the importing refiner, but still the protective duty for their product, the granulated refined sugar, has been maintained at $1.95 until two years ago, when it was reduced to $1.90. In this amendment I not only propose to take off the 7½ cents differential, which is the theoretical differential, but I propose that in the ascending scale of assessing duties we shall stop at 98° sugar, which is a good, wholesome, light-colored sugar, and make the maximum duty paid $1.75½ per 100 pounds instead of $1.90. I think it ought to be reduced more than that. I believe we ought to stop at 96 degrees, so that the maximum duty paid on any kind of sugar which comes into the United States would not be more than $1.68½.

So far as the refiners are concerned they have a better protection for refining sugar now than they had when the Dingley bill was passed, and, instead of coming here and complaining at the reduction of the duty, they ought not to object to it; and if they were not animated by the same avarice and greed that seems to have inspired their conduct for the last decade at least, they would not enter a protest against this reduction of the duty on refined sugar. The duty on refined sugar fixes the price the American consumer pays for the sugar that he consumes, and I want that duty reduced.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. DIXON. As I understand, there is no refined sugar imported into this country.

Mr. BRISTOW. Practically none—about 800 tons last year.

Mr. DIXON. What percentage of the 3,000,000 tons of sugar, cane and beet, that we use is raised in the United States?

Mr. BRISTOW. Of the 3,680,000 short tons we consumed last year, something less than 900,000 tons was produced at home.

Mr. DIXON. That was divided about half and half between cane sugar and beet sugar, was it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. The amount of beet sugar produced is now almost twice as much as that of cane sugar. I can give the Senator the figures exactly, I think. We produced last year, 1910, 262,080 tons of cane sugar and 512,469 tons of beet sugar.

The reason why I feel that the duty should be reduced to $1.755 per 100 pounds as the maximum is that I do not believe that $1.755 protection is necessary for the continuous development of the beet-sugar industry. I know it is not necessary for the American refiner; but I should like for this amendment to become a law. I do not want it to encounter a veto, concerning which we hear so much at this time. I am willing that we should reduce the duty to this amount now, and I should like to introduce a resolution, if it is permissible, requiring the Tariff Board to provide us accurate information as to the cost of producing beet sugar in the United States and abroad, and then we can easily ascertain to what extent the duty can be further reduced without injuring the beet-sugar industry.

I want to say here—and I think this is a good time to say it—that I consider the development of the beet-sugar industry of the United States as the strongest evidence in favor of the protective tariff policy that has ever been presented to the American people, and I am going to give the Senate some figures on that subject that I think will be of great interest.

In 1897, when the Dingley law was passed, there were 7 sugar-beet factories in the United States. In 1911, 14 years afterwards, there were 67, and 6 new mills were in course of construction. In 1897 there were invested in these beet-sugar factories $2,250,000; in 1911 there is approximately an investment of $100,000,000. In 1897 there were 41,000 acres planted in beets by American farmers, while in 1911 there were 400,000 acres planted in beets by American farmers. In 1897 there were raised upon the farms 389,000 tons of beets; in 1907, which is the latest date for which I could secure the figures, there were raised upon the farms more than 4,000,000 tons of beets. The amount of beets harvested per acre in 1897 was 9.5 tons, and in 1907, 10.16 tons, showing, as the Senate will observe, an improvement in the growth of the crop, so that there was a larger tonnage per acre. The yield of sugar per ton of beets in 1897 was 232 pounds. In 1911, 250 pounds per ton, showing an improvement in the saccharine strength of the beets approaching gradually the German standard. The yield of sugar per acre in 1897 was 2,192 pounds. In 1907, which are the latest figures I could get on this, 2,540 pounds of sugar per acre.

The amount of sugar produced—I am using short tons all the time in these figures—in 1897 by the beet-sugar factories was 45,255 tons.

In 1911—that is, the fiscal year 1910 and 1911—there was produced 511,000 tons, an increase in the amount of sugar which we produce from beets in the 14 years from 45,000 tons to 511,000 tons. The value of the sugar produced from beets in the United States in 1897 was a little over $4,000,000, while the value of sugar produced from beets in the United States during the last year was more than $50,000,000, an increase in the value of the product of our beet farms and factories from $4,000,000 to $50,000,000, a gain of $46,000,000, or 1,150 per cent.

Now, I want to say to some of our Republican friends, and to my Democratic friends as well, that I believe this marvelous production and development in a most important industry is due more to the high duties that were placed on sugar than to any other cause. In passing I will make this statement, returning to the homely illustration of President Lincoln. The result is that instead of sending last year this $46,000,000 to Cuba or to Europe or to Hayti or the West Indies or to Java for sugar we have produced it upon our own soil. It has been grown from our own farms, and we have kept in our own country the $46,000,000 of additional wealth.

In the 14 years that have passed since the Dingley bill became a law we have added to the wealth of the American people by this provision about $300,000,000. This money has been spent among our own people and has added to the comfort and happiness of hundreds of thousands of them.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he does not think, without the duty on sugar, instead of having the $46,000,000 we would have gotten about twice as much sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not.

Mr. GORE. What per cent; at least two-thirds; at least 66 per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. We would have bought at a less price the sugar we have consumed. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. GORE. About how many per cent?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is hard to estimate it, but it would have been probably a third less. But that is a very crude estimate—probably a quarter or a third less. We would not have spent as much money for sugar. But what we would have spent for sugar, if not the full $46,000,000, would have been a large amount—we will say at least $30,000,000.

Mr. GORE. I am not controverting the amount. I will put my question in this shape. But for the tariff——

Mr. BRISTOW. Instead of paying $46,000,000 for this sugar we would have gotten it probably one-third cheaper and paid something over $30,000,000 for it, and we would have been out the $30,000,000, and what we did pay in addition to the $30,000,000 was not lost, because we paid it into the Treasury as a revenue.

Mr. GORE. It is true that we got a great deal of revenue. But the difference between $46,000,000 and $30,000,000 was a bonus to the sugar-beet factories.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not say it was. The consumers of sugar——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I raise a question of order upon this discussion. My point of order is it is not competent for the Senator to yield for a discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will discuss the point that the Senator from Oklahoma was making and advance my views in regard to it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. And of course the Senator can, when an objection is not raised, at any time advance his views.

Mr. GORE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is out of order.

Mr. GORE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Chair to rule whether or not a question is out of order. I think the Senator from New York is hypercritical.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that a question is not out of order, but discussion is out of order under the circumstances.

Mr. GORE. Then I desire to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I submit to the censor from New York whether or not the $16,000,000, the difference between the thirty and forty-six million indicated, was not a bonus, a gratuity, a gift, or a benefit resulting from the tariff to the producers of beet sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think it was. However, I do not concede that the difference would be as much as sixteen millions. But whatever the amount was, I do not consider it a bonus. I differ from the Senator from Oklahoma on the tariff fundamentally, of course. He understands that. I believe in a protective tariff. I believe it has been a very great advantage to the people of our country. I would regret very much to see any policy inaugurated that would remove that principle from our political affairs. But I am contending as strongly as anyone can contend that that protective duty be no more than is necessary to protect legitimate American enterprises from destructive competition from abroad.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. GORE. I simply want to ask the Senator if he does not think—and this is a question—that American thrift, American enterprise, American capital, American labor might not have built up beet-sugar factories in the United States without protection——

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not.

Mr. GORE. As they have built up the cottonseed-oil industry in the United States without protection?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will state to the Senator from Oklahoma that I do not think they would have, and give him this as the reason: The first sugar that was made from beets in the United States was in 1870, as near as I have been able to learn, when that industry started. At least, up to 1870, there had been produced but 440 tons of beet sugar in the United States. From 1870 to 1897, a period of 27 years of development, we had been able to produce but 45,000 tons per year. We have been 27 years in developing our capacity to the amount of 45,000 tons, while in the 14 years that have passed since then we have increased the production from 45,000 tons to 510,000 tons per annum. I do not believe that there would have been anything like such a development of the beet-sugar industry without this protective policy. I present here a table of the beet and cane sugar production in this country since 1852.

[1] The periods relate to sugar-productions years which end with March.
[2] Average for the period.
[3] 1864 to 1870.

I realize that my Democratic friends do not agree with this. I think they are wrong, and of course I think I am right. The fight I have been undertaking to make——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Senator from Kansas if he does not think it is true that there never has been a pound of beet sugar produced in the United States that did not cost more to produce it than it would have brought in the market but for protection?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think that is probably true up to a very recent time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am sorry to hear the Senator from Kansas——

Mr. ROOT. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is raised and sustained.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That, objection being made, the Senator having the floor can yield only for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can a Senator prevent any information being given on this subject? I know something about it. I should like to state my point.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is strange if a Senator is not permitted to give any information.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not the floor. I would yield it if I had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The admission will stand, then, and it ought not to stand.

Mr. ROOT. It is the Senator from Kansas's admission.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is not his admission. It is the admission of a protectionist, and I am a protectionist as well as he.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that the Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I understood rightly the question of the Senator from Oklahoma, it was whether it had not cost more to produce beet sugar in the United States than that sugar would have sold for if there had been no protection—no duty. The theory of the Senator from Michigan is that if the duty was taken off the sugar would cost just as much as it does now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It did cost that much before we had the duty on.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I do not agree with the Senator from Michigan. I think that to take the duty off of sugar would reduce the price of sugar, because the price in other markets than ours, where there is not so excessive a duty as ours, is less. And I want to reduce the present duty on sugar just as much as it can be reduced without injuring the beet-sugar industry. I believe it can be reduced the amount I suggest now without the slightest injury. My personal opinion is it can be reduced more. If I thought and was certain that we could reduce it down to $1.68 or $1.50 I would be very glad to vote for it. But what I want to do is to reduce it this amount now and then direct the Tariff Board to ascertain what is the cost of producing beet sugar in our country, and then make another reduction, as I believe it can be made, a liberal reduction, when that cost is ascertained.

But I will never vote to reduce a duty so as to hamper, impede, or injure the development of such an important developing enterprise as the beet-sugar industry in the United States. I believe that the cane-sugar production of our country has reached practically its maximum. We did not produce as much last year as we had produced 15 years ago. But that is not true of beet sugar.

I realize that the position I take here will not be approved by my Democratic friends, who disagree with me on the question of protection, and it is resented very much by a number of my Republican friends, who will not concede that there is a lot of graft in some of these excessive duties that ought to be taken out. I know there is.

I will say this as a Republican, and I want to say it to my Republican friends here in this Chamber. The enemies of the protective system do not sit across the aisle—that is, the dangerous enemies in this Chamber. The arguments which are offered by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on the tariff question we can meet in the forum of public discussions and defeat them at every election. The American people are not for free trade. They do not agree with the Democratic position as outlined by the junior Senator from Mississippi. But the American people will never indorse a tariff policy that operates to make a few men rich at the expense of the public welfare, and this sugar duty, phrased as it is in our present tariff law, has operated to make the sugar refiners immensely rich at the public expense, and that evil can be cured by a rewriting of the law and the protective benefits can be maintained and preserved, and that is the kind of tariff revision I am standing for now.

There has been a good deal said about the Republicans getting together. Of course Republicans would always like to see the party get together—nobody any more than I. Because if we do not come to an agreement on the tariff our Democratic friends will revise it as they think it ought to be. But we will never get together as long as there lurk in these tariff schedules rates which protect monopoly or give certain concerns unfair advantage. There is no use to have conferences until our ultraprotectionists admit that they are willing that these tariffs shall be rewritten, eliminating such conditions. And when they conclude that they are ready to write our tariff laws in that way, preserving the protective principle with all of its benefits, and cutting out the graft that avarice has injected into it, the Republican Party will be united on the tariff question.

It is always more pleasant to say the agreeable things than the disagreeable things. It is always easier to agree with your friends than to disagree with them. But it always pays to be frank and open in these discussions, and I am trying to be that way.

I will say that as to the provision in the amendment which I have offered, which makes the maximum duty assessed on sugar testing 98°, I got that idea from the English tariff. Of course the English duties are revenue duties solely and much lower than ours. England begins with assessing her duties on sugar by the polariscope at 76°. The Dutch standard she does not use and never did use. Before the polariscopic process was invented she used a color standard of her own.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I think many Senators would like to be informed concerning what nations of the world now use the Dutch standard and what do not.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit me, I will answer that fully later on. I expect to approach that point in a short time.

England starts in assessing her duties with 76°, tested by the polariscope, instead of 75° as we do, and she has an ascending scale of duty as the purity of sugar increases, as shown by the following table:

Tariff of the United Kingdom on sugar.

[1] The English hundredweight=112 pounds.

Of course, it is assessed in her own coin. When the purity reaches 98, the duty is 44 cents per English hundredweight under the English tariff. That is the highest duty imposed.

In England the sugar is lower than it is in this country. I do not have the figures just here, but it is not the full amount of the duty; that is, the sugar sells in England at a lower price than it does in the United States, but, as I remember, it is not the full amount of the difference in duty, and demonstrates, as is always the case, I think, that when a duty is taken off the consuming public never gets the full benefit of that reduction. There is always an advance in the price of the commodity coming from the other country, because there is a greater demand for it in that country; and without our protective tariff we would be producing less sugar, and therefore we would have to buy more, and, being in the markets of the world as a much larger purchaser of sugar, the prices would rise.

I believe I have made it clear that our duties can be reduced in amount, as I suggest, without any injury being done to the American refiner or to the American beet-sugar industry.

The Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] asks me if I would put tea and coffee on the taxable list for revenue purposes. I will say that I would not. I do not think that is necessary, when we can raise our taxes on commodities such as sugar, and we will not only thereby receive the revenue, but also aid in encouraging the development of the latent or dormant resources we may have in our own country that are undeveloped.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. With the consent of the Senator from Kansas, I ask for the consideration by the Senate of the following order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the order.

Mr. NELSON. Before it is considered, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Bailey	Dixon	Myers	Simmons
Borah	Gamble	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	Gore	Newlands	Smoot
Brandegee	Gronna	Nixon	Stone

Crane	Lippitt	Pomerene	Williams
Cullom	Lodge	Reed
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Root

Mr. PAGE. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on the Lorimer investigating committee.

Mr. GAMBLE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CRAWFORD] is necessarily absent from the city on important business.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to make the same announcement that I made yesterday, that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is absent owing to the death of his son.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. JONES] is unavoidably detained on the Lorimer investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the following agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday, July 22, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes; and before adjournment on that day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Further:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, July 27, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool; and before adjournment on that day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Further:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Tuesday, August 1, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) to place upon the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles; and before adjournment on that day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Further:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, August 3, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census; and before adjournment on that day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Further:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, August 7, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States; and that before adjournment upon that legislative day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the resolution—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the agreement?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania whether this order has met with the concurrence of the leading men among the progressive Republicans and the leading men on the Democratic side?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there has been a very general consultation with all Senators, who had views to express, regarding this matter, and an effort has been made to suit the convenience and the views of every Senator who has expressed them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say as to this proposed order——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that this agreement was made because of the great anxiety which exists in the Senate and the great anxiety which exists in the country that the important measures before the Senate shall be disposed of. It seemed to be very generally conceded that most of these matters have been pretty well debated, and we conferred as far as possible with Senators who were likely to desire to debate the measures further.

We realized, of course, the great difficulty about getting an arrangement of this sort to suit every individual Senator. I conferred with the Senators on this side of the Chamber as far as I possibly could, and I have not found a single dissent. I will be greatly disappointed if there should be a single dissent on this side of the Chamber, as I am sure the Senators on this side of the Chamber very generally concur in what I have said about the exceeding great importance of disposing of the business now before the Senate and adjourning Congress.

I sincerely hope that there will be no objection to the proposed arrangement. We have endeavored to make such an allowance of time as would permit ample further debate. In view of the elaborate debate that has been already had on most of these questions, as the only measures really which have not been debated are the statehood bill and the apportionment bill, and we think we have allowed ample time for both of those measures, I sincerely hope there will be no objection to the unanimous consent which has been asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would like to ask whether this order has met with the concurrence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that I have been in conference with the other Senators, and after meeting objections which have been interposed and making adjustments as best we could, it seemed to all those who were conferred with that it would be wise to adopt this plan of disposing of the business; and I have given it my concurrence.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to say regarding this matter that I greatly regret that the progressives in this body, both Republicans and Democrats, have not been able to get together in such an effective organization as to prescribe a definite program of legislation which would embrace not only the reciprocity treaty and the tariff bills which have been sent from the House, but also general tariff legislation providing for a gradual reduction in excessive duties, and also great and important questions regarding interstate commerce, upon which public opinion is made up and with reference to which legislation should be speedily had.

I refer to the valuation of railroads clearly called for by the decision of the Supreme Court as one of the essential factors in rate regulation, and I refer also to the organization of an administrative tribunal of great dignity and character, with powers similar to those of the Interstate Commerce Commission, over trading corporations, such legislation to be not in place of but supplementary to the Sherman Act, and permitting great industrial organizations of the country to conduct business outside of the shadow of the penitentiary.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield for a question.

Mr. STONE. The measure to which the Senator from Nevada refers is important. So he might indicate other important legislation. Other important legislation may be passed by the House and sent to the Senate. I rise only to direct his attention especially to this point, that an agreement to vote upon the bills named in the order proposed does not adjourn Congress, and if it is thought best by the Senate and the House to go on with additional legislation, there is nothing in the way of doing it, even after this order shall have been agreed to and the bills covered by the order disposed of.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am aware of that, Mr. President; but still we all know that when the matters covered by this order are disposed of there will be an immediate demand for the adjournment of Congress.

For my own part, my judgment has always been that, whilst I am in favor of the abolition of the duty upon print paper, the only way of securing consideration of a general reduction of the oppressive duties of the tariff would be to keep the newspapers under the harrow until such legislation was accomplished. I have no doubt that just as soon as this reciprocity bill is adopted there will be a demand throughout the country upon the part of the newspapers for the immediate adjournment of Congress; that it will be alleged that the continued session of Congress is injuring business; and that a public sentiment will be created that will be powerful in favor of an immediate adjournment. I want to see the general consideration of the oppressive duties of the tariff under fair conditions, and I do not believe that we will have fair conditions for the consideration of all these questions after the newspaper question is disposed of.

So I anticipate that there will be a demand for the immediate adjournment of Congress, and I fear that the adoption of this order means that we will not, as I would wish, adopt a definite program calling for an adjournment of this session until October and a session then for the period of two months during which we can wipe the slate clean of all legislation demanded by public opinion and absolutely imperative.

Mr. President, I fear also that in the haste of this legislation we may not be as prudent in our action regarding the reduction of the tariff as we would be under fair conditions of consideration. I do not believe that the torrid conditions which prevail now are such as to invite fair and moderate consideration of this great question, and I believe the conditions will be worse when the newspapers of the country are demanding an immediate adjournment.

I think, Mr. President, we can have no such opportune time for disposing of tariff legislation as we have now, legislation not upon radical lines but upon gradual lines of reduction, involving no serious readjustments of existing enterprises and no serious disturbance of business. We will not have this opportunity at the next session. We will then have all the appropriation bills under consideration. Other legislation, general legislation, will be pressing. We will be upon the threshold of a campaign when partisans will be engaged rather in party jockeying with reference to a presidential race than in the serious consideration of a great economic question. So far as the Democratic Party is concerned, I fear that in the stress and strain of legislation now at this season intemperate action may be taken which will alarm the industries, and that again we will be compelled to enter into a campaign during a period of depression when the fears of the workingman will be aroused, when exaggeration will abound everywhere regarding disturbance of business conditions, and in which a full dinner pail may be the prevailing argument. We all know how potential that argument has been in the past. Inasmuch as the Progressives have the control of both bodies, I see no reason why we should not be able to agree upon legislation, and upon such legislation as will receive Executive approval, such legislation as will be so sustained by public opinion that the Executive would not feel inclined to withhold his approval.

So, Mr. President, I regret that the progressive forces have been temporarily divided by this contest over the reciprocity treaty; the Democrats, true to their convictions, taking the view that it means freer trade and that nothing should be done to imperil the ultimate triumph of the bill; the progressive Republicans, true to their convictions regarding protection, declaring that this bill means discrimination against the farmer and favoritism to the manufacturer, and insisting upon a protective policy that deals alike with the farmer, the miner, and the manufacturer, both sides equally sincere, and yet unable to stand together upon this proposition, and by reason of that divided and prevented from getting together with reference to the control of this body and the consideration of other important questions.

The old leadership is gone; the old control is gone. We have no longer the dominance of two or three great leaders in this body; we have no longer the tyranny of committees. The Senate to-day is a self-governing body. Composed, as it is, of competent men, I do not see why it should not transact business in a competent way and put upon the record definite statement of the questions which it proposes to take up in legislation and the questions which it proposes to take up through committee consideration, with a view to crystallizing all within a reasonable time in needed legislation.

I can not say that I object; it would be futile for me to object to this order; but I greatly regret that the newly established self-government of the Senate has not been accompanied by an orderly and efficient control of its own business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask for a rereading of the portion of the agreement which relates to the statehood bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary, without objection, will again read that portion of the order, as requested by the Senator from Idaho.

The Secretary read as follows:

Further:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Monday, August 7, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States; and that before adjournment upon that legislative day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the resolution—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee if this agreement—this gentlemen's agreement, or otherwise, whatever it may be—contemplates that these are the only measures to be voted upon, and that after the vote the effort shall be made to adjourn?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this request for unanimous consent only covers the bills mentioned therein. Of course the Senate and the House of Representatives are free to take up any other measures and to continue here until a date for adjournment is agreed upon. The agreement simply provides for the disposition of these five measures.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire, if it be in order, as to why the bill providing for the publicity of contributions in campaigns has been omitted from this agreement?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it was very difficult to bring about an agreement on the measures contained in the orders which have been read, and several difficulties were encountered in including that measure or other measures in any unanimous-consent agreement at this time. There will be nothing, however, to prevent the Senator from Iowa asking the Senate to consider the bill to which he refers; in fact, it is more than likely to be reached in due order on the calendar; its position and its prospects, so far from being jeopardized, are rather aided by this unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, not having been here many months, I was a little at a loss to understand whether this agreement might exclude this measure. It was suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that these important measures were to be voted on. I have thought that the publicity of campaign expenses bill was as important as any bill that was before the Senate. I sat in the gallery at the Chicago convention and saw a plank that came from Wisconsin defeated along this line. The Democratic Party had such a plank in their last platform. It is a bill that both sides ought to be able to agree upon and pass at this session. I am not going to object or to raise any question on the unanimous-consent agreement, but I do give notice that, so far as it may be proper, I shall attempt to call up that bill every day and urge it to a vote at this session of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as the Senator from Iowa seems perhaps to have construed my remarks about an adjournment as indicative of an indisposition to consider the publicity bill, I desire to say, if he puts that construction on my remarks, I certainly did not intend it. I have been trying to get that bill considered, and shall continue to try to get it considered, but I think when we get these five very important matters embraced in one unanimous-consent agreement we have made great progress in disposing of important legislation. Those bills will be out of the way and there will be a better chance for considering the bill to which the Senator has referred after those are disposed of than to leave them still in doubt.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will not urge an adjournment, then, until a vote is had on the publicity bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. And I shall certainly be very sure to aid the Senator from Iowa in every way possible to get consideration of the publicity bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am heartily in accord with the terms of the agreement as proposed, but I want a little light on a parliamentary matter. This agreement being entered into, I take it there can be no vote upon the reciprocity measure or any amendment now pending or to be hereafter proposed until Saturday, the 22d.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that as a parliamentary question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes there may be votes on amendments right straight along as the bill is being considered, but that the vote upon the passage of the bill must be upon the day named in the agreement. However, any amendment not theretofore disposed of must then be voted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. The agreement, however, seemed to me to embrace all amendments pending and all that may be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not amendments theretofore disposed of, the Chair assumes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to have a clear understanding with regard to that part of the agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. If I may be permitted, if the Senator will yield——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course amendments can be offered and voted on prior to that date. The unanimous-consent agreement simply provides that all amendments undisposed of or which shall be offered on that day shall be voted on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair make this suggestion? The unanimous-consent agreement expressly provides that the vote shall be through the ordinary parliamentary procedure, which means, of course, that the bill must be voted on in Committee of the Whole, and then, when reported to the Senate, the amendments can again be submitted, and the Chair assumes that the bill would not be reported to the Senate until the day named.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Secretary please read the terms of the agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will once again read the proposition.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday, July 22, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, and that before adjournment on that day the Senate will vote upon the pending amendment, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is very clear, Mr. President, from the reading of the agreement, that the pending amendment can not be voted upon until Saturday, the 22d of July, and, of course, no other amendment could be voted upon prior to the disposition of the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the intent—although the Chair did not draw this agreement—was that the then pending amendment should be voted upon.

Mr. CUMMINS. If there can be inserted the word "then" it will remove the obscurity which seemed to me to exist.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By consent of the Senator who suggested the agreement, the Secretary will insert the word "then."

Mr. PENROSE. I accept the suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. One further inquiry.

Mr. ROOT. Let the word "then" be inserted in each case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; in each case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will make the suggested change in each case.

Mr. CUMMINS. After the agreement shall have been made, this bill, I understand, remains the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly; until it is displaced.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that we ought to have in the agreement an understanding that if, prior to Saturday, the 22d of July, there shall be no disposition to debate the pending bill, he will be willing to have it laid aside temporarily, in order that the Senate may take up such a bill as has been suggested by my colleague [Mr. KENYON], or any other bill, for debate and disposition.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, of course that would be the intention. As I am advised, the debate on the reciprocity bill is nearly exhausted. There may be two or three Senators who still desire to address the Senate on that measure, and then the unfinished business would be laid aside and the Senate could proceed to the consideration of any of these other measures.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I observe that at the last moment the words "without debate" were stricken out of the several proposals, and it occurs to me that they should be reinserted. I put it in the form of a parliamentary inquiry. Take the reciprocity proposition, for instance. It is provided as to that that it shall be voted upon on the 22d instant. Now, the 22d is the full calendar day running up till 12 o'clock midnight of the 22d. Supposing many important amendments were pending, but that the debate consumed all the time up to 12 o'clock of the night of the 22d, at which time the order would require the bill to be voted upon, we might never reach a vote upon the pending amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator suggest inserting the words "without further debate"?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It seems to me that the last day should be given up to voting and that the words "without further debate" should be inserted in all those orders clear through.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LODGE. That will greatly improve it.

Mr. PENROSE. Those words were in the original agreement, but were stricken out at the suggestion of a Senator. However, in my opinion they ought to be in the agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is in error about the words "without further debate" being stricken out at my suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not mean to say at the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, but at the suggestion of a Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will insert those words in the several agreements.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to hear the last paragraph again read with those words in it, to see what effect it will have. Under that proposition we may not get a chance to debate the question covered by the last paragraph at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, August 7, 1911, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to the consideration of the joint resolution H. J. Res. 14.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senator from Wisconsin desires that we proceed upon that date to vote upon that matter without any further debate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not desire the reinsertion of those words in that particular order. I think so long as——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will not insert the words in that portion of the order.

Mr. PENROSE. That is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the entry of the order? The Chair hears none, and by unanimous consent the order is entered.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. STONE. If it does not interfere with the plan of any other Senator or any other announcement that may have been made, I will say that on Tuesday next, when the reciprocity bill is laid before the Senate, I should like at that time to address the Senate upon that bill. I am making this announcement so that if I am interfering with anyone else I may change the date.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no other announcement for speaking upon that day.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, before proceeding I should like the leader of the Democratic side to remain, if he will.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is present.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want to say, before the Senator from Virginia leaves the Chamber, that if the amendments I am offering, providing for the reduction of duties on these necessities where such duties have been a burden to the people, are not incorporated into the reciprocity bill, I intend to offer them at every opportunity to other tariff bills that may be presented. I will further say to the Senate that the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on a certain day has very wisely been so formed that amendments can be offered on any intervening day to any of the bills that are pending and be voted upon at that time, so that Senators who contemplate escaping from the Chamber or from the city at any time between now and the 7th of August may find some of their bills amended when they get back.

My purpose is to reduce duties that are a burden to the American people. I am not contending for the reduction of duties that never have been complained of, as this reciprocity bill does. It can not be hereafter alleged that opportunity was not given for Senators to reduce excessive duties, such as were referred to by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] in his remarks pending the consideration of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I simply desire to say to the Senator from Kansas that there is no doubt whatever about his parliamentary right to offer amendments, as he has indicated a purpose to do. So far as I am personally concerned, as the Senator well knows, I shall vote against any amendment to the reciprocity bill, but when his amendments are offered to some other bill they will have my careful attention and consideration. I am as anxious as he is that Senators shall remain, not only to avoid a vote being taken in their absence, but I am anxious that every Senator shall be present in the Senate during the consideration of these very important matters; and, so far as I am concerned, the Senator need not fear that I will escape from the Senate any longer than may be necessary, as I was about to escape a few moments ago to get a little lunch. I will be present and be delighted to hear anything that the Senator from Kansas may have to say, and will be sure to give to all he says and to all his amendments careful consideration.

Mr. BRISTOW. I regret that the Senator from Virginia will not vote to attach these paragraphs to the present bill, because, if so attached, I have not the slightest doubt they would become the law and the reciprocity bill that reduces unimportant duties would then actually carry with it reductions that are of great importance. I fear, if they are not attached to this bill, that there is great danger of such duties not being reduced, and that is the reason that I am appealing to the Senator from Virginia and to Senators on the other side of the Chamber generally to help amend this bill, because it means effective legislation, when, in my judgment, failure to amend it greatly jeopardizes such legislation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If perhaps bills and amendments to bills which will give substantial relief to the great body of the American people can not meet with the approval of the present Chief Executive, I do not think we shall have to wait longer than two years until we shall have both a Congress and a President, so that we can pass laws which will relieve the great body of the people from the burdens which they have been carrying.

Mr. BRISTOW. I gravely fear that that is the uppermost thing in the mind of the Senator from Virginia during this special session, instead of passing the remedial measures at this time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The uppermost desire in my mind is to have a Congress and a President that will relieve the people from the burdens which they are carrying.

Mr. BRISTOW. And the Senator would a great deal rather postpone any revision of the tariff or any relief of that burden until he has an opportunity to get such a President—that is, he would rather that the legislation I have proposed should not pass than to have taken away an issue that may, in his judgment, be effectively used in the next campaign.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Kansas must not measure my corn in his half-bushel measure. It is pretty well understood that that is the game he is playing here, but he has no right to attribute any such purpose to me.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia is entirely mistaken, for I have not the slightest desire that two years from now there shall be in the White House a Democratic President who will favor the revision of the tariff according to the opinions advanced by the Senator from Virginia. I do not want such a thing to happen. I want the burdensome duties taken off now at this session of Congress, and not delayed for two years.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Opportunity will be given to the Senator to vote for measures which will relieve the burdens of the people, so far as the responsibilities of the Senate are concerned, and he knows that. He is an advocate, as he has stated, of the protective tariff, but this side of the Chamber does not advocate duties in behalf of the great trusts and industrial institutions of the country, which are taxing beyond reasonable measure the resources of the great body of the American people.

Mr. BRISTOW. And the Senator from Virginia knows that the Senator from Kansas does not advocate any such duties; that he is now contending against them; and that he would repeal them if he had the support of the Democratic side of this Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state his point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. The point of order is that a Senator can not be interrupted without the consent of the Senate. It has been ruled this morning several times that he can only ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the ruling this morning, the Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do for a question. I can only yield for a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not interrupt for the purpose of asking a question, but I interrupt to suggest that the point of order, so far as I am concerned, is hardly applicable. I do not think I proceeded at any time, at least I tried not to do so, until after I was recognized by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was several times ruled this morning that a Senator who had the floor could only be interrupted for the purpose of a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who I regret is not in the Chamber now—doubtless he is in the lunch room, which is entirely proper—made an inquiry when I yielded the floor to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] as to whether or not the Cuban planters and sugar producers had received any advantage as a result of the Cuban reciprocity treaty. I made the statement, as Senators will remember, that the sugar refiners received all of the advantage of the reduction of the duties; that the Cuban planters received none; and that the American consumer received only about 1.7 cents per 100 pounds reduction. In support of that declaration I want to read from the hearings held before the subcommittee of the House of Representatives on June 28, 1911, from the testimony of Mr. Gilmore, a partner of the Arbuckles, who are engaged in the sugar-refining business, on the question whether or not the Cuban planters received any part of this 20 per cent reduction in the duties on imported raw sugar from Cuba:

The CHAIRMAN. What effect, if any, did it have on the market price of raw sugar at New York?

That is, the Cuban reciprocity agreement.

Mr. GILMORE. Well, we had cheaper raw sugar from Cuba.
The CHAIRMAN. Cheaper by the amount of the reduction in duty?
Mr. GILMORE. Well, I do not know that it was that amount fully, and yet I think it was, too.
The CHAIRMAN. You think it was?
Mr. GILMORE. I do; yes.
The CHAIRMAN. That concession was 34.5 cents, was it not?
Mr. GILMORE. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And you think it reduced the price of raw sugar that much in New York?
Mr. GILMORE. I believe it did. We commonly believed that the Cubans had not benefited at all, because they had given away the benefit.
The CHAIRMAN. What is that?
Mr. GILMORE. I say we commonly believed that the Cuban planters did not benefit at all by it, that they gave it away, and sold it that much cheaper.
The CHAIRMAN. To whom did they give it?
Mr. GILMORE. To the refiners; and the refiners, of course, gave it to the public.
The CHAIRMAN. Did the consumer of refined sugar in the United States get the benefit of that concession, in your judgment?
Mr. GILMORE. I believe he did get the full benefit of it.

I have demonstrated by conclusive, indisputable figures that the only advantage which resulted to the consumer was a reduction in refined sugar of 1.7 cents per 100 pounds, while the refiners bought it, according to their own statement, for 34½ cents per 100 pounds less.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not Mr. Gilmore represent the Arbuckle Refining Co.?

Mr. BRISTOW. He does. I stated that he did.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not Mr. Gilmore testify that the Arbuckle Refining Co. wants free sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. He did, I think; yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then if he testified that he wanted free sugar, how is it that this is helping the refineries?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will explain to the Senator gladly, and I thank him for bringing up that point.

The only competitors of any consequence that the American refiners have in this country are the American beet-sugar producers, and free raw sugar from the West Indies would, as the Senator from Utah knows, destroy the beet-sugar industry in the United States and thereby destroy the only competitor that the American sugar refiner has. If he can have free raw sugar, so that he could get it from the West Indies without paying any duty, it would then cost him $1.34 a hundred less than it does now. Having a monopoly of the refining business in the United States, he would be able to crush the beet-sugar industry in this country. Therefore he is now engaged in a propaganda to induce the American Congress to repeal all sugar duties. There is not a beet-sugar producer in the United States who is not in some way connected with the Havemeyer estate or the Sugar Trust who does not know that that is true.

Again, Mr. Atkins, the vice president of the American Sugar Refining Co., said to be the largest purchaser of raw sugars in the world, testified before the committee of the House on Tuesday, June 13, 1911, and I read from his testimony on page 164 of section 2 of the hearings before the House committee.

Mr. ATKINS. You asked me another question that I wanted to explain a little further. That was, what advantage the Cuban has out of this—if he makes no dollars and cents out of it. He has the advantage of the United States market against all the world. He can undersell every country in the world in the United States market to the extent of that differential. Porto Rico or any of the free sugars that come in can undersell Cuba to the extent of $1.34 and still get the same money for the sugar that Cuba gets. Now, that is the very greatest advantage—for Cuba to be able to have the control of the United States market.

Of course, referring to the treaty—

To-day—and when I say "to-day" I mean at this period—the foreign imports from all other parts of the world have practically disappeared. The rate of duty under the Dingley Act of $1.68½ is a dead letter, and $1.34 is the revenue rate of duty on sugars, because Cuban sugars supply nearly all the demand for foreign imports.

Mr. MADISON. Yes; there is no question about that; but it is also true, as you stated, that during the time that the sugar is really coming to the country that reduction is of no practical benefit to them; they do not get the benefit of the 34 cents reduction.

Mr. ATKINS. No; they get no money out of it.

There is the testimony of officers and representatives of the two greatest refineries in the United States, one of them the greatest refinery in the world, and the gentleman testifying, Mr. Atkins, being, so it is reported, the largest purchaser of raw sugars in the world, states that the Cuban producer gets no part of the 34½ cents reduction in the duty that was given in the Cuban reciprocity bill.

I incorporate this testimony in the RECORD to demonstrate the accuracy of my statement that Cuban reciprocity transferred from the Treasury the amount of 20 per cent of the duty on all Cuban sugar to the pockets of the sugar refiners, less 1.7 cents per hundred pounds, and that that law has in fact given them a differential far greater than was ever contemplated when the Dingley law was passed, and that they have no complaint, and can have no complaint, at the reduction of duties as I propose.

I can not understand why any man should object to reducing the duty on refined sugar very materially. As I have said, I think it ought to be reduced more than I have suggested. But I am very anxious to get what I can now, and hope at an early date to get additional reductions, always maintaining a sufficient duty to encourge and promote the continued development of our beet-sugar industry, which should be the pride of every American citizen.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	McCumber	Pomerene
Bailey	Cummins	McLean	Root
Borah	Curtis	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bourne	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Gronna	Myers	Smoot
Briggs	Guggenheim	Newlands	Swanson
Bristow	Heyburn	Oliver	Taylor
Brown	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Townsend
Burnham	Kern	Page	Watson
Chamberlain	La Follette	Paynter	Williams
Clapp	Lippitt	Perkins	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Poindexter

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague is necessarily detained on the committee to examine into the Lorimer matter. I wish to make this announcement for the day.

Mr. BURNHAM. I wish to make the same statement as before with reference to my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BRISTOW. Another result of the amendment I have offered will be to increase the revenue. Now, that is an interesting proposition—to increase the revenues by reducing the duties and still not increase importations. It is not unreasonable to suggest an increase of the revenue by decreasing the duties, if such reductions will result in an increased importation, but this amendment of mine as it is now drawn will reduce duties and still increase the revenues without increasing importation. It does it in this way. The sugar that is imported—that is, 80 per cent of it—tests 95° by the polariscope, and that pays a duty of $1.65 a hundred. If you take out the Dutch standard color test, sugars will be imported that test by the polariscope more than 95. Sugars will come in above 16 in color testing 97 and 98, because there will be a market for sugar of the lighter color. Sugars of that color, for instance [indicating], sugars of this color [indicating], will come in and pay $1.75½, while they would now have to pay $1.90, and that is high enough to keep them out and they do not come in at all. They come in as dark sugar that tests 95, and therefore only pay $1.65.

If the Dutch standard were taken out it would come in as sugar testing 98 or 99, and instead of paying $1.65 it would pay $1.75; and the same hundredweight of sugar that is brought into the country and consumed would cost less to the people, because the duty would be a reduction on refined sugar, which is the protective duty which the refiner has when he sells it; it would be less by 15 cents a hundred than that, while it would pay more duty by 10 cents a hundred than the duty which the refiner pays when he buys it for refining purposes. So the result would be that the importation of sugar for sale to the public instead of to the refiner and the importer would pay $1.75 duty on the high-grade sugar, while otherwise the refiner would purchase the same sugar in a darker color and only pay $1.65 duty.

I will now take up the Dutch standard and discuss that. It has been referred to many times, and the Senator from Utah and myself had an animated discussion concerning it yesterday. The Dutch standard is a device for testing the purity of sugar, that was adopted more than a century ago by the Dutch merchants of Holland. It was a color test. At that time the color test was the only test known for the purity of sugar.

It consisted of 17 bottles of this type [indicating], representing grades of sugar from 8, which was the lowest, to 25, which was the highest. This is No. 8. That was the lowest in commercial use—all cane sugar, of course.

The Dutch standard was never used to measure the saccharine qualities of beet sugar. It was first devised something over a hundred years ago. Then there was an ascending scale from 8 up to 25. That is No. 12 [exhibiting], the bottle I now hold in my hand. This one is No. 14 [indicating]; this one is No. 15; this is No. 17; this is 25. This 25 is pure sugar [exhibiting]. Before the centrifugal process of refining or purifying sugar was invented or devised sugars never were manufactured as white as that, because the old process of cleansing and purifying sugars by settling was the only one known. That is, a hogshead would be provided with holes in the bottom of it and the sugar would be dumped from the boiling pan into the hogshead and the molasses would settle to the bottom and drain out of it and the sugars on top were the purest sugars. That process was used until it was made as pure as it was possible to make it under that process. Those sugars are called now muscovado sugars, and that process is used in the crude form in many countries. It is almost exclusively used in the Philippines, where the sugars are very crude up to this time, some improvement having been made in recent years, I believe.

For a long time this Dutch standard was the only process known to commerce for testing the purity of sugar. If I remember rightly, about 30 years ago—I may not be accurate in my statement as to the exact number of years—a scientist discovered a process known as the polariscope process, by which rays of light were passed through the melted sirup, and any impurity, such as water or molasses, in the sugar deflected the rays, so that it would measure with absolute accuracy the saccharine strength of the sugar. That has been substituted by every organized government on the earth for the color test, with the exception of seven. All the countries never adopted the Dutch standard absolutely. The English Government, as I said this morning, had a sugar test of its own. It has discarded that now and follows the polariscope test exclusively.

I have examined the tariffs of 117 nations, or I should say organized governments, on sugar, and 110 of the 117 do not use a color test. A large number of those that formerly used the color test and the Dutch standard as the prevailing test have discarded it. I want to read a number of the principal nations which have discarded and no longer use the color test: The United Kingdom of Great Britain, Australia, the Bahamas, Barbados, British Guiana, Jamaica, Newfoundland, the South African Customs Union, the Argentine Republic, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark—I will say that Denmark discarded it within the last two years; three years ago Denmark was one of the countries that used it; at that time there were eight; there are now only seven—Ecuador, Egypt, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Mexico, the Netherlands, Norway, Roumania, Russia, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, Venezuela, British Central Africa, British East Africa, Bermuda, British North Borneo, Dominica, Servia, Persia, Danish West India Islands, Algeria, French West Africa, Martinique, Guatemala, Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras, French Oceanica, German West Africa, German East Africa, Holland—the Hollanders have abandoned it and no longer use the standard which her merchants established—Dutch West Indies, Dutch Guiana, Montenegro, Portuguese Southwest Africa and Southeast Africa, Costa Rica, Bolivia, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic.

The countries that use the Dutch standard at this time are Canada, Portugal, Sweden, British India, China, Japan, and the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. And Germany?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; Germany discarded it several years ago.

It is an interesting observation, in examining the tariff, that none of the countries use it in the same way we do, because they have an ascending scale in assessing duty when tested by the color as well as by the polariscope. That is, Portugal permits sugar to come in that is not above No. 20 Dutch standard before the maximum is assessed, which makes a very light sugar, while we assess the maximum duty if it is only 16 in color. I do not happen to have at present a sample of 20, but it is slightly darker than this [indicating]. Sweden has 18 as the maximum. British India varies from 16 to 22, grading the duty as the sugar becomes purer, so that the maximum duty is not assessed until the sugar tests 22 in color. Japan has 4 grades, 11, 15, 18, and 21. The United States fixes 16 as the sole grade and makes all sugars above that color pay the highest duty, and it is the only Government that uses the Dutch standard, with the exception of China, that fixes the maximum so low. China fixes it at 10, and refined sugar is almost an unknown quantity in China. The only place where they sell the black sugar of the Philippines, a sample of which I am sorry I have not here, is really in China. That is the reason why we do not get any more Philippine sugar than we do. It is because there is so much impurity in it that the refiners here do not want the trouble of taking the impurities out of it.

Canada has an interesting use of the Dutch standard, and it is much more favorable to the public than ours is. Canada fixes in her laws a color test as well as the polariscope test, the same as we do. All sugars not above 16 Dutch standard in color and testing not more than 88° pay $1.08 per hundred pounds. A sugar as low as 88 in purity is a dark-colored sugar. So there is no difficulty in the Canadian consumer purchasing the light-brown sugar at a reasonable duty. A sugar of that kind [indicating], which is the old brown sugar we used to see in our markets, that tests 96, and is above 16, in Canada the importer would pay a duty of $1.08 plus a cent and a half a degree in purity for every degree above 88. So the duty in Canada on sugar like that sample, which is above No. 16 in color and tests 96 in purity, would be $1.20 a hundred. It is not barred by the Dutch standard there, because the saccharine purity still regulates the amount of the duty after No. 16 in color is reached, while our tariff requires that after 16 is reached the maximum duty is assessed, regardless of the saccharine strength or purity. So that sugar which tests 88 or 90 and is above 16 pays $1.90 instead of $1.40½, or $1.475, as it should. In Canada it would pay exactly what it ought to pay, measured by the polariscope test as to its purity.

If this Dutch-standard provision of ours required that No. 16 in color sugar testing 96 should pay $1.68½, and that for every degree above 96 it should pay 3½ cents a hundred, it would correspond with the Canadian duty and would not give the refiners the monopoly that the Dutch standard does in our tariff, because it could not be used as a means of forcing all sugars to the refiners for a market. Light-brown sugars could then come in and pay a duty on their purity. I herewith submit a statement from a well-known scientific authority, Dr. Harvey W. Wiley.

WHAT DR. WILEY SAYS.

Dr. Wiley, in an article in The Forum, written some years ago, in speaking of the Dutch standard, says:

From a strictly scientific point of view, the only objectionable feature of the sugar schedule is the Dutch standard of color.

In former times, when the Dutch merchants dealt only in Java sugars, and the polariscope was not in commercial use, the color standard was a useful method of discriminating between sugars of different saccharine strength. Now it is possible to make a nearly white sugar which will not give a polariscopic reading of above 85, and a very dark one—below No. 16, in fact—which will polarize nearly 100.

It is a pitiable spectacle to see a great nation, the largest sugar consumer in the world, confiding the standard of its revenue from this great staple to an irresponsible foreign broker. The makers of sugar the world over will fill the orders received from the importers of this country with a product over or under No. 16, as may be desired. The grade of color will have no constant relation to saccharine strength. It is easy to see that there will be no burning desire among our importers to pay the differential of 12.5 cents per hundred pounds, when, by dumping a little molasses or lime into the kettle during manufacture, the same saccharine grade of sugar can be secured with a dark color, and that amount of duty saved.

It is not claimed that the differential duty is for the benefit of the sugar growers in this country. Any protection afforded to them is properly given in the direct tariff, as determined by the polariscope. The injection of the Dutch color standard into the tariff bill was either a case of heredity—it having existed in former bills—or else it was due to some influence brought to bear upon our legislators. It is not probable that a company consisting mostly of lawyers, sitting in a star chamber to determine the methods of levying duties, would think of the abuses to which the Dutch standard could be subjected.

If our people understood the unfair and unscientific discriminations imposed by the Dutch color standards, they would soon find means of abolishing them.

This paper, having been written from a scientific point of view, has nothing to do with a differential duty. The latter is solely an economic question. But we have a right to protest against an unfair, partial, and false standard for ascertaining the grade of sugars on which the differential is paid.

Dr. Wiley, as we all know, is an eminent scientist, and stands for the best things in our economic and scientific affairs, and his word should have some weight with us upon a question of this kind. Dr. Wiley, in another article in The Forum, in volume 23, says:

By retaining the obsolete system of valuing sugars according to the Dutch standard of color, however, this difficulty is only increased.

One hundred years ago, when the Dutch colonies produced cane sugar in a uniform manner by the same process of manufacture, the character of the sugar was rather definitely determined by its color, but modern systems of manufacture have rendered such tests absolutely worthless. The retention of this standard in our customs duties is the open sesame to favoritism and every conceivable fraud.

DAVID A. WELLS'S VIEWS.

David A. Wells, a well-known authority, in referring to the Dutch standard, says:

What is of one color in cloudy weather may be another in sunshine, and the simple process of drying alone may cause a difference of one or more numbers in grade in any given sample of sugar. There have undoubtedly been cases where the delay contingent on holding a cargo of sugar for reexamination and resampling has, from drainage and drying, subjected the importer to a very considerable additional amount of duty.

I hope I have made that clear to the Senators who are attempting to follow me, and if I have not, I shall welcome any questions, of course.

The allegation is made that the Dutch standard is intended to protect the American consumer from the importation of impure sugar, and the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] stated yesterday that that was its purpose. In that the senior Senator from Utah is mistaken. It is not intended for that purpose, and it does not serve that purpose. There is no process of purifying sugars that is so cheap as the centrifugal process. It is the cheapest process of purifying and refining sugars known to men. On this subject I read a statement made by Mr. A. Given, of the Agricultural Department:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, Bureau of Chemistry.

There are no methods by which raw sugar can be bleached white or nearly white known to this office, other than by steam washing, which will make it nearly white. The sirup can be white and the crystals obtained therefrom are white by bone-black filtering, but this process is as expensive as refining the sugar and making it perfectly white, even more expensive, as filters will not last as long with impure sirup as with pure sirup.

A. GIVEN, Scientific Assistant.

The old process of draining is of course cheaper, but it does not purify; it leaves the sugar very dark; the molasses will not seep out; but the rapid revolutions of the centrifugal machine—1,500 times a minute——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a moment. Will throw out the molasses the same as the rapid revolutions of the cream separator will throw the milk—the heavier of the ingredients—to the outer edge of the receptacle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator again?

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a moment. It is the same principle exactly. Molasses, which is heavier than the sugar crystals, is thrown to the outer edge of the revolving receptacle and the inner part of the crystals are thereby freed from the impurities, which are not anything that is foul or unwholesome; it is simply not sugar; it is either water or sirup. This sugar [indicating], which is sugar testing 98, is just as pure and wholesome and healthful as refined granulated sugar, but there is some molasses and water moisture in it which is not sugar. That is called impurity, not because it is impure, but because it is a substance foreign to the saccharine.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Did not the Senator on yesterday say that the pure-food law would protect the American consumer on that class of sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; if there were anything unwholesome in it, it would.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not. The Senator has just so stated that. That is what I wanted the Senator to admit. Then another thing, Mr. President. Did not the Senator yesterday say that the centrifugal process was not a refining process?

Mr. BRISTOW. He did not. The centrifugal process is a refining process.

Mr. SMOOT. Is not every pound of sugar that comes here——

Mr. BRISTOW. Just wait a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield at present.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will yield in a moment. The centrifugal process is a process of refining. The Senator from Kansas never has said anything else. He contended yesterday that it was, and he so states now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did not the Senator from Kansas yesterday say that every pound of sugar that came from Cuba went through a centifugal process?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I do not think I said that every pound. I will answer the question.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, 96——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I demand the floor until I answer the question. If the Senator will wait until I get through, I will yield to him for as many questions as he wants to ask.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not want any street-corner debate, such as we had here yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not ask anything but questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Kansas does not think he said yesterday that every pound that comes from Cuba went through the centrifugal process, but he did say that a very large percentage of the sugars that come from Cuba go through the centrifugal process of refining.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator now has admitted that the centrifugal process is a refining process of sugar.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly. I never denied it. I always stated it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then yesterday the Senator stated that under the law all sugars refined by any process would pay $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. I never said that. I never made such a statement, and the Senator from Utah knows it.

Mr. SMOOT. Well——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the law says, "on sugar above No. 16 Dutch standard in color and on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining," $1.90. If the Cuban sugar has gone through a process of refining, why does not all Cuban sugar pay $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because it does not, and if the Senator from Utah has examined the imports he knows it does not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Just wait until I get through, please. Just remain quiet now; do not get excited.

The customs officials in interpreting that law and collecting duties construe the word "refined" to refer to sugars that have passed through the process of refining used by the American sugar refiners, the bone-black process of refining; and the customs officials do not consider that language to mean that sugars which are refined or purified by the centrifugal process are to pay the full $1.90 per 100 pounds. The customs officials therefore assessed a duty, as the Senator from Utah knows, of $1.68½ per 100 for sugars that test 96 and are not above No. 16 Dutch standard in color. Nine-tenths of those sugars, I should judge, at least, are sugars that have been refined or purified by the centrifugal process, and the customs officials do not assess the $1.90 per 100 pounds duty on that sugar unless in color it is more than 16 Dutch standard. If above 16 Dutch standard they assess $1.90, regardless of its saccharine purity.

Now, I have answered the question of the Senator and in order——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a minute. I desire to complete the answer. In order to fortify my statement as to the facts I will read from the imports entered for consumption for the year ending June 30, 1910, as given by the Bureau of Statistics. I am reading from the figures that are provided by the Bureau of Statistics——

Mr. SMOOT. We do not disagree in that.

Mr. BRISTOW. As to the amount of duty that is paid on sugars that are below 16 Dutch standard regardless of their saccharine purity.

We imported over 3,000,000,000 pounds of sugar that tested not above 95 degrees from Cuba, and that sugar paid $1.65 per hundred pounds duty less 20 per cent. That was not above 16 in color and not above 95 in saccharine purity.

We imported from Cuba 296,000,000 pounds of sugar that tested 96 by the polariscope and that was not above 16 Dutch standard, and that paid at the customhouse a duty of $1.68¾ per hundred, less of course the 20 per cent, which applies to all these quotations.

We imported from Cuba last year 2,369,000 pounds of sugar not above 16 Dutch standard, that tested 97° by the polariscope, and the customs officials collected on that importation $1.72 a hundred pounds, less the 20 per cent. This is centrifugal sugar refined or purified by the centrifugal process, in color not above 16 Dutch standard, testing by the polariscope 97, and the customhouse officers collected $1.72 and not $1.90.

We imported from Cuba 1,611,000 pounds of sugar not above 16 Dutch standard testing 98° by the polariscope, and the customs officials collected on that sugar $1.75½ per hundred pounds duty, less 20 per cent. If any of the sugars to which I have referred, testing from 95 up to 98, had been above 16 in color they would have paid $1.90 per hundred pounds, but since none of them were above 16 in color none of them paid $1.90, though they were all centrifugal sugars refined in Cuba by the centrifugal process.

I think I have answered the question of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator and I do not disagree as to the figures he has quoted, but I want to ask the Senator now in all seriousness if a sugar that is 95 per cent has not gone through a process of refining?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, the law says:

> And on all sugar which has gone through a process of refining, 1 cent and ninety one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound.

The Senator also, as I understood him, said that they had decided that the only case of refining was where a bone black had been used in the refining of sugar that would pay $1.90.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will allow me, let me state exactly what I did say. I said the customs officials in assessing the duty interpreted the word "refining" to refer only to that process of refining used by American refiners, who use the bone-black process.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not a fact that many of the beet-sugar refiners of Germany do not use the bone-black process, and is it not a fact that the beet-sugar industry in the United States does not use the bone-black process of refining? Therefore, under the statement made by the Senator that such sugars would not be refined sugars, German beet sugar could come into this country as unrefined sugar. I will not again interfere with the Senator to ask him any more questions; but if I have time, I shall discuss that question. I want Senators to know just what the truth is under the law.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, referring to the Senator's question, the beet-sugar factories in the United States may use another process in refining their sugars.

Mr. SMOOT. For the information of the Senator, I will say they do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Upon reflection, I believe that many of our beet-sugar factories refine by the use of lime and centrifugals. I am aware that there is in Germany a sugar known as "crude beet," I believe.

Mr. SMOOT. "Beet root" is the name by which they call it.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is an impure sugar that would not find a market here, and could not, except to refiners; it does not come to this country, and there has never been any effort to export it to this country. The Germans can refine it there just as cheaply, but our duty on the refined sugar is so excessive that the Germans never have made any attempt at all to invade our sugar market.

The only competitor that the beet-sugar industry in the United States has is the cane sugar from the Tropics. Anyone familiar with the beet-sugar business knows that the German beet-sugar producer is not a competitor of the American beet-sugar producer. He can not meet the American in this market with the duty on refined sugar that now exists, and to ship to this country his crude sugar known, as the Senator suggests, as "beet root," is not practicable, because it would not find a market; it would not be fit to use; it would have to be sold to the refiners, and no one would export crude beet sugar from Germany to be refined here when he could refine it in Germany. It would be an impracticable thing to do, and therefore it is of no use to consider such a proposition.

The truth is that the beet-sugar producer in this country has but one competitor, and that is the sugar of the Tropics, and the sugar of the Tropics has no market here now except to the refiners. They are the only purchasers of tropical sugar, because the Dutch standard of color keeps it so dark that it can not find a market with the general public. Therefore, the American refiner, using tropical cane sugar in its raw state, purifies it, refines it, and puts in on the market as refined granulated sugar. That meets in the American market the product of the beet-sugar factory, which only produces the refined granulated sugar. The beet-sugar manufacturer produces only refined sugar, and he can meet in successful competition any tropical cane sugar or centrifugal sugar, that has not gone through the process of bone-black refining, with a duty of $1.75 or less. He can meet that competition successfully, and being able to meet that competition successfully, there is not the slightest occasion for any duty in excess of that to give him the necessary protection.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I asked the Senator from Kansas a question yesterday which, I think, was not very clearly answered, and which, as it has been again brought up to-day in this portion of his discussion, I should like to have him now make clear. I asked him yesterday under what authority the customhouse officials, in passing upon the admission of Cuban sugars, would allow less than a duty of $1.90 per hundred pounds, and assume that it must reach the 16 Dutch standard in order that that assessment might be levied upon it, when the law clearly declares that the duty of $1.90 a hundred pounds shall apply where the sugar measures up to No. 16 Dutch standard, and also—although the word "also" is not used, it is clearly understood—also where the sugar has gone through a refining process? Now, as the centrifugal process is a method of refining, where do they get the basis for the construction that sugar which has gone through the centrifugal process and is a refined sugar, but is not in color the Dutch standard, should not have assessed against it a duty of $1.90 per hundred pounds? That seems to me to be the whole crux of this question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am very glad the Senator has put that question in that way. I might say that, possibly, I have used the word "refining" in a sense that the customs officials would not recognize. I have said that any process of purifying sugar was a process of refining. The purifying of sugar and the refining of sugar, to my mind, are identical terms. Evidently the customs officials do not so consider them. Any process that cleanses sugar from impurities or from foreign substances, to my mind, is a process of refining.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the law mean that?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think it does. I will give the Senator from North Dakota my views on it as I proceed.

To my mind, that is a process of refining. The first was the old process of settling, which produces what is known to the trade as muscavado sugar—that is, the dark, moist, sugars, the best of which rarely grade above 89 in saccharine strength. That is a process of refining. It is that process which was the earliest known to men.

The centrifugal process was subsequently discovered, and it is a very great improvement, just the same as the cream separator is an improvement over the old system of permitting the cream to rise to the top of the jar and skimming it off. We have made progress in gathering the cream as well as in gathering the sugar crystals out of the cane juice. I have treated that process as a process of purifying or refining. I have used the terms as synonymous. Evidently the Treasury Department does not consider the term "refining" as used in the law to refer to either of those processes of purifying sugars. I think the Treasury Department is right, because if it did, if the word "refining" in the law referred to any process of purifying in the technical use of it, they would have to assess $1.90 on any kind of sugar that came in, for there is no sugar that has not been purified to some extent by some process, and I might say refined to some extent by some process. But I think the confusion probably arises from my use of the terms "purifying" and "refining" as synonymous, while technically the Treasury officials would probably consider them to be terms referring to different processes—one a process used by the refiners, who take what is know as raw sugar and produce from it granulated sugar, and the other a process which takes the cane juice and produces from it the lighter brown sugars and, in the most perfected form, the white sugars by the centrifugal process.

That is the only explanation that I can make. I have taken it for granted that that is the distinction they make. I do not give this as authoritative at all, but it is my explanation of the fact that they do not consider centrifugal sugars as refined sugars as so described in the statute.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator now is clearing up that which was the bone of contention between him and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and which some other Senators, including myself, did not very thoroughly understand. The process of refining under the bone-black process is simply eliminating from the bulk of the sugar the water and the sirup, or those things which we call impurities.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the process known as centrifugal is eliminating the water and the sirup. Both of them secure exactly the same end, both eliminate from the bulk of the sugar the same ingredients; but as the law does not mention the bone-black process or any other process, why should the customhouse officials adopt the standard they have if some better standard can be obtained, even though it might bring in much more sugar, very much cheaper, or even at a higher rate?

I want in this connection to suggest to the Senator that if he is going to differentiate between these processes and denominate one as "a purifying process" and the other as "a refining process," then his amendment, in order to get the benefit of these provisions, ought to refer to the purifying as well as to the other process, and give us the benefit of that, so that there can not be the same mistake again, or what I, at least, regard as a mistake by the customs officials.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator's suggestion might remedy what apparently on its face appears to be an inconsistency in the ruling of the Treasury Department; but I do not think the Treasury Department could consider anything else as the intention of Congress, because we provide, first, that the duties shall be 95 cents a hundred pounds on sugar that tests 75 degrees, and for each additional degree of purity the duty shall be 3½ cents additional. Of course we could not help but mean 3½ cents for each additional degree of purity, and the impurity or foreign substance must be taken out by some kind of a process. Therefore Congress meant that if there was 25 per cent of sirup or foreign substance in sugar other than the saccharine crystals, there should be a duty of 95 cents levied on it. Now, to get out, degree by degree, these foreign substances, it must be done by some process of refining; and we go on and refine and purify until we get 90 degrees, we will say, and on the 90-degree sugar the duty is $1.47½, if I calculate it correctly. The difference between 95 and $1.47½ is assessed, because impurities have been taken out by this process of refining.

If Congress did not mean that those impurities should be taken out in some way, that provision should not have been in the law; and so the Treasury Department could come to no other conclusion than that Congress meant that the sugar should be assessed on the degrees of purity up until the color reached 16; and the color having reached 16, then a different method of assessing duties is adopted; that is, the polariscope is then set aside and the color method is adopted. The color method being adopted, then the department has concluded that the process of refining meant what is commonly known as refined or granulated sugar. It came to the only conclusion to which it could have come under the circumstances.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, to make it absolutely clear, this bottle [indicating] has been refined—or, rather, purified—by the centrifugal process.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; so I am advised.

Mr. McCUMBER. And not by the bone-black process?

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that bears a duty of $1.90 per hundred pounds?

Mr. BRISTOW. Because of its color.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not because it has been refined, but because it is above No. 16 Dutch standard?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The sugar in this bottle [indicating] I understand has been refined by another process?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. By the bone-black process?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And it bears a duty of $1.90?

Mr. BRISTOW. It does.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not because it is above the No. 16 Dutch standard at all, but because it is refined and, of course, it absolutely is above any color.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment. If it were not above 16 it would not carry the duty of $1.90. If it were below 16 in color, it would carry a duty on its saccharine strength by the polariscope test.

Mr. McCUMBER. After it has been refined by the bone-black process, will it not always be above No. 16?

Mr. BRISTOW. It will always be above that; yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore, the $1.90 has no reference whatever to the Dutch standard in this sample, because it necessarily must be above No. 16 Dutch standard.

Mr. BRISTOW. As to that sample; yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. That duty is upon the refinement and not upon the Dutch standard. I think we understand the Senator's position pretty well now.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, Mr. President, I have a number of statements and tables here that I would like permission to insert in the RECORD at the proper place, as I have quoted from them frequently.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire also to incorporate into the RECORD a statement from Mr. David Stetson as to the cost of refining sugar—and, of course, when I refer to "refining sugar" I refer to the process used by the American refiners and not to the centrifugal process. In a letter which he wrote to Mr. W. B. Thomas, of Boston, Mass., published in No. 16 of the hearings before the committee of the House of Representatives which were had June 30, 1911, he makes the statement that at 50 cents for refining sugar the margin would be small, yet there is a paying profit in refining at one-half cent per pound.

The difference in price of raw and refined sugar in the United States varies from 75 cents a hundred to 90 cents a hundred, and sometimes it is more than 90 cents a hundred; and this gentleman, who says that he knows, states that there is a good profit in refining sugars at 50 cents a hundred pounds, showing that the margin of profit to the refiner above 50 cents per hundred pounds is an excessive profit for their business; and since the high duty on refined sugars shuts out foreign competition it is too high; it prevents any importation; it is prohibitive; it ought to be reduced; and it can be reduced in excess of the amount that I suggest in this amendment, because such reduction can be made without in the slightest degree harming the legitimate profits of the American refiner, and the reduction can be made without jeopardizing in any way the success of our beet-sugar industry.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The sugar duties may be too high or too low, but I do not think the Senator meant to say that they were prohibitive——

Mr. BRISTOW. They are on refined sugar.

Mr. LODGE. Because we have to import an immense amount.

Mr. BRISTOW. But it is all raw sugar. We import very little refined sugar.

Mr. LODGE. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not saying that the duties on raw sugars in the coarser state—that is, in a condition such as this [indicating] or that [indicating]—are too high. They would be too high if we were not getting practically all of the sugar that we import from Cuba upon which a reduced duty is paid. We imported last year from Cuba, in round numbers, 1,750,000 tons of raw sugar, upon which there was a reduced duty of 20 per cent from the duty provided in the law; and we only imported 213,000 tons from all other countries upon which duty was paid. I would say that if it were not for the Cuban treaty, that gives a reduction of 20 per cent on the raw sugars we actually import, the duty on raw sugar ought to be reduced; but I am not asking for the reduction of the duty on raw sugar, because it is a very fruitful source of revenue; and, in addition to being a fruitful source of revenue, it provides a very desirable protection for our beet-sugar industry; but the duty on refined sugars, on the high-grade sugars, can be reduced without jeopardizing the interests of the refiners and without jeopardizing the interests of the beet-sugar industry. The reduction will result in a lowering of the price which the people pay for their sugar, and not result in a loss of revenue, because the high-grade sugars are not imported in appreciable quantities, and we derive little revenue from them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Do not the sugars that are produced by our American beet-sugar factories come out of those factories as refined sugars?

Mr. BRISTOW. They do; yes. They are all refined.

Mr. LODGE. The best refined sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not bone-black refined?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes; I think it is.

Mr. LODGE. The sugars supplied to the market by the beet-sugar factories are perfectly refined for use, are they not?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes.

Mr. LODGE. Why is it, then, that the removal of the duty the Senator speaks of would not affect the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. BRISTOW. Because the American beet-sugar industry can meet German competition with a less protection than it now has. The competition which the beet-sugar industry has—and I am just as much interested in preserving that industry as anybody can be—is not the German beet-sugar producer, but the tropical cane-sugar producer, whom he meets in competition through the American refiner. The truth is that the American refiner, whose supply of sugar for his refineries comes from the Tropics, is the real competitor of the beet-sugar producer, because he takes the raw sugars, refines them, and puts them on the market, where they meet the beet sugar, and the refiners are only paying a duty of $1.34 a hundred pounds, while they have got a protection on their product of $1.90.

The beet-sugar factory can meet the German competition, because, first, the German has got to pay freight and insurance from Hamburg, which is about 20 cents a hundred; and then he does not make as good sugar as does the American, or as is the American cane sugar. It will not sell for as much; indeed, beet sugar does not sell for as much as does American cane sugar. Beet sugar always sells at slightly less than the American refined cane sugar.

It sells for from 10 to 40 cents a hundred less than the cane sugar is sold for. In order to get a market for this new sugar, the beet-sugar producer has got to crowd out the cane sugar, which is staple sugar and has been for centuries, and he has got to underbid a little to do it. He is not afraid to meet the product of any German beet-sugar factory with a duty of $1.68 or $1.75 per 100 pounds. He can do it with ease.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not true, as a general proposition applying to sugar everywhere, that beet sugar can not compete with cane sugar? Suppose all duties and all bounties were cut away, the beet sugar could not compete with the cane sugar?

Mr. BRISTOW. It could not possibly do so.

Mr. LODGE. It has been, I know, for many years bounty fed in Europe.

Mr. BRISTOW. It was until a few years ago.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; until a few years ago, beginning away back in the time of the first Napoleon.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. And ours, of course, is protected. It is the cane sugar that would put all beet sugar out of the market.

Mr. BRISTOW. Germany developed her wonderful sugar-producing resources by paying a bounty to the sugar producers. To-day Germany is the largest producer of refined sugar in the world. I think I can turn without any great delay to the statistics showing the amount of sugar produced in the various countries. I will, for the information of the Senate, give some of the figures. I read from a table headed "Production of sugar." It is for the year 1909–10 and gives the amount in long tons. In all the statistics I have put into the RECORD this morning I have used short tons, because that is more commonly used in our country, and the Treasury Department uses it, though the statisticians in New York use the long ton.

Germany produced last year 2,020,000 long tons and exported 778,000 tons of sugar. The next largest producer of sugar outside of Cuba was Russia. All her sugar was beet sugar, and of that sugar Russia produced last year 1,171,000 tons, but she exported only 98,000 tons, consuming the rest. I herewith submit a table on European production and consumption:

Production of sugar—Total statistics from Sept 1, 1909, to Aug. 31, 1910, according to Otto Licht.

[From Willett & Gray's Sugar Trade Journal, Jan. 19, 1911, p. 30.]

These European countries—Germany, Austria-Hungary, France, Russia, Belgium, Holland, and Sweden—all export beet sugar. They produce not only all the sugar which they themselves use, but they export very large amounts, and Germany encouraged her sugar production by a bounty up until a few years ago, and then it was removed.

Mr. LODGE. It was removed a few years ago. Perhaps the Senator knows what those sugar duties are.

Mr. BRISTOW. I have not the German duties on sugar now, but she has a duty on cane sugar, I know.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. But I do not happen to have the statistics convenient. They are in a pamphlet here, and it would take me some time to find them.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator has cited those figures of production, has he there the total production of the United States, including Porto Rico and Hawaii, including cane?

Mr. BRISTOW. I have, and I will put that into the RECORD. I have the production and our importations from these countries.

Mr. LODGE. It would be very useful to have them together.

Mr. BRISTOW. Last year—that is, 1910—we imported from Hawaii 555,000 tons. That is the largest importation we have ever had from the Hawaiian Islands. We imported from Porto Rico 284,000 tons, which is the largest importation in the history of the island. We imported from Cuba 1,734,000 tons, which is the largest importation from Cuba in the history of the island. We imported from the Philippines last year 87,000 tons, which is not nearly all the sugar that is produced in the Philippines, but it is the largest amount that we have imported from the Philippines, I think, in the history of the country. We imported from other countries, upon which the full duty was paid, only 216,000 tons.

Now, the production of sugar in Hawaii last year was 543,000 tons, or slightly less than we imported from there, because evidently the planters held over some of the sugar that had been formerly produced.

There was produced in Cuba last year 1,792,000 tons, and of that we got 1,734,000 tons—all but about 60,000 tons.

Porto Rico produced last year 330,000 tons, and we imported from there 284,000 tons—about 40,000 tons less than the production. I will remark here that when the Porto Rican sugars were first admitted free the entire production of Porto Rico was 89,000 tons. That was in 1901. The entire production of the island when it came into our possession was 89,000 tons, while the production last year was 330,000 tons, an increase of almost 300 per cent in the 10 years since the island became an American possession. It may be a source of interest to know that the Philippine production last year was 179,000 tons, which is more than has been produced in the islands during any other year.

Sugar imported into the United States from Hawaii, Porto Rico, Cuba, the Philippines, and all other countries.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator has the figures there, what was the total production in the United States of beet sugar and Louisiana cane?

Mr. BRISTOW. I gave that this morning, but I will be very glad to give it to the Senator again.

The total production of cane sugar in the United States last year was 262,000 tons, which is a very much smaller amount than we have produced in any year in the last few years. It was a bad year. The usual production of cane sugar is about 375,000 tons. The production of beet sugar last year was 512,000 tons, which was the largest in the history of the country.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] inquires of me as to our percentage of the consumption of sugar of the entire supply of sugar for the world. Eliminating the India sugar, which is a very crude kind and all consumed in India, there are about 12,000,000 tons produced per annum.

Of course these statistics are not absolutely accurate, but that is in round numbers the amount that is given by the most reliable statisticians. We consumed of the 12,000,000, 3,330,000 tons, more than one-fourth of all of the sugar, except the India sugars, and more than one-fifth, including all the sugar produced on the earth and consumed by its people. In this I have given the amounts in long tons.

Mr. LODGE. Do we now consume more than England?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think I have England's consumption here. England's consumption last year was 1,783,000 tons, so that our consumption is almost double that of England.

Mr. LODGE. Far ahead.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senate would adopt this amendment to the reciprocity bill. When I say I know it will not jeopardize the passage of the bill, that it will not jeopardize the signing of the bill, I do not mean to say that I have any assurance whatever from the President that he would or would not veto it if this amendment were made a part of it. But I know that no sane man who has the interest of the American people at heart, who believes in justice and equity to the citizens of his country, would refuse to sign a bill which he thought ought to become a law because there was incorporated in it this reduction in our present sugar tariff; and knowing that, I do not believe that there is any excuse or justification for any Senator in this Chamber who believes that these duties should be reduced to vote against this as an amendment to this bill.

To vote against this amendment is to jeopardize the prospect of securing this legislation, because the President has said, as I read yesterday, or the newspapers say that he has said and it has not been denied, that he intends to veto separate bills, but he has never said, and I defy any Senator to say that he has said, that he will veto this reciprocity bill if it carries with it the reduction of duties that ought to be made on commodities used by the people. No Senator can evade the responsibility of preventing this legislation by getting behind the imaginary and unreal excuse that it may endanger the reciprocity agreement. I know it will not as well as I know that I am alive.

You do not have to have any assurance from the President of the United States that he would not veto a bill of this kind because it carried this as an amendment. I make the statement now and I make it not in an offensive sense, that the Senators in this Chamber who say they want duties reduced and who refuse to vote for this amendment certainly do not want the duties reduced at this time. They want to keep the duties as they are, to have something to talk about in the next campaign, and for no other purpose, and the responsibility for holding these duties that are indefensible is with the Democratic Senators who refuse to permit this bill to be amended. The duties can not be defended—no man will stand on this floor and defend them, unless it is the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and he will have very little company. Attaching this amendment to this bill means legislation, to refuse to do so means that the Senators on the Democratic side of this Chamber prefer a campaign issue next year to relieving excessive duties now. It can mean nothing else.

Mr. President, when this amendment is voted upon I would like a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Senator from Kansas asks for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That on and after the day following the taking effect of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the following articles, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the following rates of duty, namely:

Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75 degrees, ninety-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test up to 98 degrees, thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; and above 98 degrees by the polariscope one and seven hundred and fifty-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound; molasses testing not above 40 degrees, 20 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40 degrees and not above 56 degrees, 3 cents per gallon; testing above 56 degrees, 6 cents per gallon. Sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). I ask leave to announce that my colleague is necessarily absent from the Senate engaged in the business of the Senate.

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I understand if he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea." I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am informed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and others that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], with whom I am paired, if present, would vote "nay" on this proposition. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. My colleague is necessarily absent, as I before stated.

Mr. BORAH (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted in error. I forgot my pair. I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My colleague, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is unavoidably detained in the Lorimer investigation. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] is absent and is paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I have a general pair at the present with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is unavoidably detained in connection with the Lorimer investigation, and is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire also to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent, and he is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I do not know whether the Senator from California has made that announcement or not, but I want to make it if he has not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], not knowing that there was going to be a vote and having a matter of business down town, is unavoidably absent at this time. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is detained from the Senate by reason of illness in his family.

Mr. WARREN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]; but I am informed he would vote the same way as I would, and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (after voting in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote. I did not observe that my general pair was not in the Chamber.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber. He is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. Understanding that the Senator from Kentucky would vote "nay" on this question, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I am informed by his colleague that if present he would vote "nay," and I am at liberty to vote. I will therefore vote, in order to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who has not voted; and unless my vote is necessary to make a quorum, I desire to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's vote is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. STONE. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 39, not voting 44, as follows:

YEAS—8.

Bourne	Brown	Cummins	Gronna
Bristow	Clapp	Dixon	Nelson

NAYS—39.

Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Owen	Terrell
Clarke, Ark.	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Thornton
Crawford	Jones	Percy	Tillman

So Mr. BRISTOW's amendment was rejected.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that when the Senate adjourns today it be to meet on Monday morning next at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BRIGGS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 75, submitted by Mr. LODGE June 19, 1911, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the clerk in the post office be hereafter designated as "chief clerk of the post office," and receive an annual salary of $1,800, and that the person now holding the office of assistant postmaster be appointed messenger at the card door and receive an annual salary of $1,600.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6 and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment, after the word "Congress," insert the following: "being for the fiscal year 1912"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of line 6 of said amendment strike out the word "herewith" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hereby"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For compiling and editing the edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, $800"; and the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

CALUMET RIVER BRIDGE, INDIANA.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2878) to authorize the Chicago, Lake Shore & Eastern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Calumet River, in the State of Indiana, to report it favorably, with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 102) thereon.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Virginia.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 8, after the word "River," to insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," and, on page 2, line 2, before the word "third," to insert "twenty," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chicago, Lake Shore & Eastern Railway Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the States of Indiana and Illinois, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Calumet River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in the northeast quarter of section 3, township 36 north, range 8 west of the second principal meridian, in Lake County, in the State of Indiana, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EX-SOLDIERS IN EMPLOY OF SENATE.

Mr. CUMMINS. From the Committee on Rules I report, with amendments, Senate resolution No. 72, submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] June 19, 1911, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments were, in line 5, before the word "satisfactory," to insert "necessary and," and, after the word "satisfactory," to insert, "who are not otherwise provided for," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate are hereby directed to retain in the employ of the Senate those persons who served in the Union Army during the late Civil War, and whose service in the Senate is necessary and satisfactory, who are not otherwise provided for, and to continue such persons in their positions until cause for their removal shall have been reported to and approved of by the Senate and their removal directed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to suggest that the word "present" ought to go into the resolution before the word "positions," so as to read "in their present positions." The detail from the Sergeant at Arms' office was abolished, according to the action of the caucus, and if a soldier holding a detail is to be continued he is to be continued in his present position, notwithstanding the abolishment of the detail. All I care is to have it understood.

Mr. LODGE. I hope that will not be agreed to. The desire is to put these soldiers on the roll.

Mr. CUMMINS. There has been no action of the Senate with regard to the detail.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well, I withdraw the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, several weeks ago the Senate passed the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States. The matter went back to the House, owing to an amendment, and afterwards came here, and upon motion we asked for a conference and appointed conferees.

There seems to have arisen in the situation a very grave and profound question, and that is whether the House conferees shall notify the Senate conferees or the Senate conferees notify the House conferees. So far there has been no meeting of the conferees, owing to the fact that this very difficult and very grave constitutional problem, I suppose, is undetermined. Everyone will recognize at once that it presents a very serious question, undoubtedly one of the most serious questions with which this body has ever had to deal, as to whether the House conferees shall appear at our door or we appear at their door.

Owing to the seriousness of this matter, I do not desire this afternoon to urge it. I want to give the Senate full time to consider it in all its grave import. But unless the conferees are able to get together some time during the coming week I will ask the Senate to direct the Senate conferees as to how they shall get in touch with the House conferees.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. NELSON. I trust the Senator from Illinois will yield to me for a minute.

Mr. CULLOM. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I feel that the criticism of the Senator from Idaho, as far as it reflects on the Senate conferees, is wholly unwarranted. My associates, the chairman of the conference committee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], are not here. The joint resolution is in the possession of this committee. It has always been my experience in matters of conference—and, I think, that of every Senator here who has had experience in such matters is to the same effect—that when the House conferees are ready to act they call upon the Senate conferees. We have the joint resolution in our possession, and we have been ready at all times to meet with the House conferees, but they have manifested no disposition to do so up to this time; and we are certainly not to blame.

We have simply, in this case, followed the course that has been pursued in every instance since I have been here, and I have been on a number of conference committees; and there are many Senators who have been here longer than I have who have been on conference committees and have had the same experience. We have simply, in this case, followed the practice that has occurred in the Senate all along. We have been ready to meet with the House conferees whenever they indicated that they were ready to meet with us. I would ask older Senators who have had experience on conference committees to give their experience in this matter. I am sure the Senate conferees are not in fault. We have been ready at any time to meet with the House conferees.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CULLOM. For any further explanation I am entirely willing to yield, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. REED. My attention has just been called to this situation by a Member of the House of Representatives. It seems that the chairman of the House committee, Congressman RUCKER, was called to Kansas to attend the funeral of former Representative MITCHELL, who died in the service a few days ago, and that Mr. RUCKER was delayed a day or two longer than he expected, but the advice from his office is that he will be here tomorrow. I say that in justice to the chairman of the committee of the House and probably it will throw some light on the delay.

Mr. BORAH. It was not my purpose——

Mr. REED. I have just been informed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] that his information is that Judge RUCKER has actually arrived in the city. If that is true, I am sure Judge RUCKER will not willingly delay the matter.

Mr. BORAH. I only wish to say, Mr. President, that I was not intending to criticize the committee. I thought a situation had arisen which ought to be discussed. Possibly it was a different situation than I thought it was. It seems to have simplified itself, and it may not be necessary to call it up again.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 7 minutes in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 17, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 15, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, be graciously near to us as individuals and as a people, and lead us by Thy spirit into green pastures and by the side of still waters. "Surely our lines have fallen into pleasant places." Thou hast possessed us of a land flowing with milk and honey. Our riches are almost beyond compare; but we realize that riches do not constitute the greatness of any people. Our schools and institutions of learning are turning out thousands of educated men and women; but education does not constitute the greatness of any people. It is the moral and spiritual fiber woven into the warp and woof of the Nation's heart. So we pray for the heavenly gifts more abundantly that we may be great and glorious. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 12, 1911, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. CULBERSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2878. An act to authorize the Chicago, Lake Shore & Eastern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Calumet River in the State of Indiana;

S. 3023. An act to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes;

S. 270. An act for the relief of Matthew Logan; and

S. 2877. An act amending section 67 of the act approved March 3, 1911, to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2878. An act to authorize the Chicago, Lake Shore & Eastern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Calumet River in the State of Indiana; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3023. An act to amend section 2527 of the Revised Statutes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

S. 270. An act for the relief of Matthew Logan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2877. An act amending section 67 of the act approved March 3, 1911, to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL WEDNESDAY NEXT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I recognize that there is not a quorum here, and if an objection comes from that side I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the gentleman withdraw his motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the motion, Mr. Speaker. Of course, if there is objection, I know that we can not adopt the motion without a quorum.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following conference report on the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a conference report (No. 62), which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contin-gent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6 and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment, after the word "Congress," insert the following: "being for the fiscal year 1912"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of line 6 of said amendment strike out the word "herewith" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hereby"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For compiling and editing the edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, $800"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.
F. E. WARREN,
ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The accompanying statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1911, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action recommended in the accompanying report upon each of the Senate amendments:

On amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5: Appropriates for certain expenditures of the Senate as follows:

For compensation of session employees from July 1, 1911, during the remainder of the present session, $3,680;

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $15,000;

For additional amount for the assistant clerk to the Committee on Immigration during the fiscal year 1912, $420;

Makes the unexpended balance of the appropriation for inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate for the fiscal year 1911 available during the fiscal year 1912.

On amendment No. 6: Strikes out the appropriation of $250 proposed by the Senate to pay for extra services for compiling eulogies and statuary proceedings for the Sixty-first Congress.

On amendment No. 7: Makes a specific appropriation of $800 for compiling the Congressional Directory for the present session of Congress, instead of authorizing the payment of an indefinite sum out of the contingent fund, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 8: Strikes out the provision for an attorney at $3,000 for the Government Printing Office.

On amendment No. 9: Inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, re-ceding to the State of Georgia jurisdiction over the site on which is located the old Federal building recently sold to the city of Atlanta.

On amendments Nos. 10, 11, and 12: Authorizes the payment of existing indebtedness for the completion of a chapel building at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., in the sum of not exceeding $5,000; and appropriates $150,000 to complete the construction of an Army supply depot at Fort Mason, Cal.

On amendment No. 13: Inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, amending legislation of the last session of Congress on the naval appropriation act, concerning clerks to general storekeepers of the Navy.

On amendments Nos. 14, 15, and 16: Appropriates, as proposed by the Senate, $1,750 for work at the Capitol and repairs thereof on account of the fiscal year 1911, and $7,000 for the care and improvement of the grounds surrounding the Capitol and the Senate and House Office Buildings, to continue available during the fiscal year 1912.

On amendment No. 17: Appropriates $281 for special emergency repairs to the Court of Claims Building.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this report be considered at this time. The report has been printed in the RECORD, but the statement, which has just been read, has not been printed. But it is a unanimous report, and I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this conference report be considered now.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if there is any particular reason why this should be considered now and not go over until we could get an opportunity to read the report?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a reason that is urged in behalf of the consideration of the report at this time. This bill carries the money for the House contingent fund, out of which certain mileage is to be paid to certain witnesses. I am informed that certain witnesses have been brought to the city of Washington from California. The committee has finished with them, and has been for sometime, and the witnesses wish to leave the city and would rather take the money to which they are entitled away with them.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska that the conference report is printed in the RECORD to-day, and there is nothing in it about which there would be any controversy. If the gentleman will see fit to withhold his right to object, I am willing to run through the various items and explain them.

Mr. NORRIS. The idea struck me that this same appropriation bill that we passed contained only two or three items, as I remember, and as it comes back now it carries a lot of Senate amendments. And unless there is some reason for it, I do not think we should rush into the consideration of it without giving every Member the right to examine and consider it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Everyone has had an ample opportunity to investigate the amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the rule——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, if he will allow a statement about these amendments, I have no doubt he would not object. The bill when it passed the House appropriated $31,606. As it passed the Senate it carried $210,581.

Of the amount added by the Senate, however, $150,000 is for the completion of the Fort Mason supply depot in California. In 1907 contracts were authorized up to $1,500,000, and $1,350,000 had heretofore been appropriated.

It appears that the work will be completed about September 1, and that the contractors will be entitled to their money at that time.

The esimate for the current year was $200,000 of the $350,000 required to complete the work. In the transmission of this estimate of $150,000, which reached the House the day after this bill passed the House, it was stated that when the estimates were made for the current fiscal year it was believed that $200,000 would be sufficient. That, however, was a misstatement, because Gen. Aleshire, the Quartermaster General, testified before the Committee on Appropriations, when the sundry civil bill was under consideration, that the work would be completed by the 1st of October, 1911; that he had prepared an estimate for $350,000 to be incorporated in the sundry civil bill, but had been directed to revise the estimate and submit an estimate for $200,000 instead. If the estimate for the amount actually required had been transmitted at the last session, the money would have been appropriated.

Outside of this item of $150,000, the other items added by the Senate aggregate $28,531, of which amount the sum of $20,181 is appropriated for the Senate.

The Senate has attached to this bill the items required for the payment of its session employees during the months of July and August. It has reappropriated the unexpended balance of an appropriation which was made for investigations by Senate committees, available during the past fiscal year, and as there is a balance of about $12,000 unexpended of the $25,000 that sum has been reappropriated. Otherwise they would require a new appropriation. Investigations are being conducted by the Senate in certain well-known matters, which are costing a considerable sum of money, and they have reappropriated this unexpended balance.

There were two Senate items to which the House conferees did not agree. One re-created the position of attorney in the Government Printing Office at $3,000 a year and the other was the payment of $250 for services in connection with the preparation of eulogies—a statutory proceeding. Those were not agreed to.

Outside of the items of which I have already given an explanation, there is an item which proposes to permit the application of $5,000 of an appropriation of $10,000 made for the Fort Sam Houston chapel. An enthusiastic clergyman offered to raise $50,000 for the purpose of building a chapel at Fort Sam Houston, Tex. After he had obtained about $40,000 it was found that it was impossible for him to raise the balance of the amount. Congress at its last session appropriated $10,000 in the Army appropriation bill to complete this chapel.

Prior to the 1st of July, the beginning of the present fiscal year, certain indebtedness had been incurred in connection with the work, which it was intended that this appropriation should cover, to the amount of $5,000. The Comptroller of the Treasury has held that while the department can expend the $10,000 this year to complete the chapel it can not apply any of that appropriation to the indebtedness which was incurred prior to the 1st of July, and which it was intended that this appropriation should be available for.

Mr. NORRIS. Does this item increase the appropriation $10,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it does not increase the appropriation at all, but it makes a part of the appropriation of $10,000 available for work done prior to the 1st of July, and, of course, the remainder of the appropriation will be available for work done after the 1st of July.

Mr. NORRIS. Take that item. What is the particular hurry? Why should we pass on that now without having it printed in the RECORD under the rule, and having an opportunity to examine into it and take it up in the regular way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No particular hurry as to this item.

Mr. NORRIS. Were any of these amendments brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations in the House before the gentleman reported this bill originally?

Mr. FITZGERALD. These items which are now in the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. They have been placed in the bill by the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some of them were.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman's committee failed to report them to the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. None of these items which asked for deficiency appropriations were submitted to the committee, but before the conferees met the conferees on the part of the House met and went over the various items and determined what, in their judgment, the House desired done, and proceeded to act in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that since appropriations ought to originate in the House, the men who are interested in these appropriations ought to appear before the House committee originally and ask the Appropriations Committee to consider them there rather than to take them up in this way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, appropriations must not, I regret to say, originate in the House. There is no requirement that appropriations should originate in the House. A long practice growing out of the fact that originally the Committee on Ways and Means handled both the revenue and the appropriation bills, has made the House take the position that it would originate all general appropriation bills, but there has never been any law to that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. But that has been the practice always, I think, that all appropriations originate in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate has not at all exceeded any of its prerogatives in submitting these amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is right that appropriation bills should originate in the House, I do not believe this should be done in this way. That has been the custom. We have an instance here where practically all of the appropriations in the bill have originated in the Senate, never having been considered in the House and never having been considered by the Committee on Appropriations of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, that is neither an unusual nor an extraordinary thing. It is the common, ordinary practice of this House. Appropriation bills go to the Senate, and the Senate in the exercise of its powers adds numerous amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; suppose they do, but the gentleman knows they have not passed the House after the ordinary and usual procedure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These amendments have been considered in the ordinary and usual manner.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not disputing that; but the procedure now would be to have this report printed in the RECORD and then let it lie over under the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The report has been printed in the RECORD, but the House rule requires that the report be accompanied by a written statement by the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. That appears this morning for the first time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does, but the items are so few and so simple that if the gentleman read the report he would not require the assistance of the statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Ordinarily a Member does not look for the report until it has been made here, because he knows under the rule it is going to go over and be printed, and that then he would have an opportunity to examine it. I confess that I have not read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that it does not convenience me in any way to dispose of this matter now. I present it and ask for its disposition because of the desire of a number of gentlemen who are familiar with the report, who are familiar with the matters in it, who desire to have it disposed of to-day, rather than to have the House meet Monday and dispose of it. This report has been scrutinized by those who are familiar with the items, and I will say to the gentleman that there is no item——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I have not reserved this right to object because I knew of any item that was in this appropriation bill which was objectionable, or that I thought ought to be defeated. I have not read the report. I reserved the right because it seemed to me that the attention of the House ought to be called to the fact that unless there is some particular reason for it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a particular reason.

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). We ought not to take up appropriations in this way. Most of the items, and by far the largest in amount, are before the House now for the first time. They have never even been before the Committee on Appropriations of the House. I am not going to object now, having called the attention of the House to the situation, but it seems to me we ought not to have this done as a precedent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's statement is hardly accurate about these amendments having been before the Committee on Appropriations. These Senate amendments have received the same full consideration as every Senate amendment that has ever been added to an appropriation bill, and the gentleman's statement is misleading.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I will admit that I have not denied that, or at least I have not indicated it. The gentleman now is seeking to take a course he will admit is different from the ordinary course, and that is the reason——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I will state to the gentleman from Nebraska this is not an unusual proceeding.

Mr. NORRIS. The usual proceeding is for it to lie over under the rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. During an extra session of Congress when tariff legislation was alone being considered these bills have been considered in exactly the same way. No items that are controverted have remained in the bill. The ones that the House objected to went out upon the insistence of the House conferees.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman's own request shows it is not the usual procedure because he asked unanimous consent to consider it now and it comes up in this way. Ordinarily it would go over until the House met on Monday or Wednesday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that heretofore when Congress has convened in extraordinary session for the purpose of revising the tariff, bills of this character have been enacted without the existence of an Appropriations Committee in the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that has occurred, but I think the gentleman will not contend that unless there is some extraordinary reason that that is a good way to legislate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not believe as a rule it is, and I will state this to the gentleman——

Mr. NORRIS. I concede readily there may be conditions where even that would be necessary, but it is not the right way to legislate unless there is some reason for doing so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If there were anything in this report that in my opinion would arouse the antagonism of the Members of the House on either side I should call attention to the matter at once so they would have an opportunity to express themselves.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the gentleman would do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I will say that the large item of this bill is $150,000, for the purpose already specified——

Mr. NORRIS. But bad legislation, however, comes from the fact that even when there is nothing wrong a precedent is established by which undesirable legislation is often put through.

Mr. GARNER. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but there is no particular urgency. However, I do not object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I have tried to listen to what the gentleman from New York has been saying, but on account of the confusion and talk around me I have been unable to do so. This bill is of importance. Congress is not really to be considered in session for the purpose of making appropriations at this time, and inasmuch as we are to have a session of the House on Monday it looks to me as if this matter ought to go over so that Members of the House could have an opportunity of reading the report of the conferees and reading the remarks of the gentleman from New York in the RECORD, so we can all thoroughly understand this measure. If it is right I will offer no objection to it, but I do want to see that it is right so far as I am able to ascertain, and I am sure other Members of the House are in the same boat with me along that line, and for that reason I will have to object to its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIMS). Objection is heard.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will withhold his objection——

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my objection.

Mr. CANNON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas——

Mr. MACON. Arkansas (saw).

Mr. CANNON. I said Arkansas (sas); I do not know what is the correct pronunciation of Arkansas.

Mr. MACON. Arkansaw is the correct pronunciation, I will state to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. The late Senator Oglesby once, when in the chair at the other end of the Capitol and a Senator from Arkansas rose, used an entirely different pronunciation. He said, "The Senator from Arkan-sass." I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. MACON. If the gentleman will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the Legislature of Arkansas, having observed these different pronunciations, deliberately passed a concurrent resolution declaring the pronunciation of the State to be "Arkansaw."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the gentleman that this bill has received very careful consideration. First, the House disagreed to the Senate amendment. The bill was printed with a Senate amendment and disagreed to by unanimous consent, when, in point of fact, a quorum was not present, although the RECORD shows a quorum, the point not being made. There was a very thorough conference, every item of the bill being considered.

I have no doubt but that every item is correct, and for the reason stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], it does seem to me that it is proper that the bill should be passed to-day. Of course, it can only be done by unanimous consent. That is the only way that we can avoid the absence of a quorum, and it is the only way under the rule by which this bill can be considered to-day. I indorse everything that the gentleman from New York has said about it. I suggest to the gentleman, as a member of the minority, that in this hot weather——

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. It is cool now.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says it is cool; but for the convenience of Members, it seems to me that the gentleman, on second thought, might at least consider whether it is not well enough to pass this bill, as there is no doubt about the propriety of all the items in it, and therefore withhold his objection.

Mr. MACON. I can not see any material harm that can come to anyone by withholding this matter two days longer. We are to meet on Monday because we can not adjourn over without a quorum——

Mr. BARTLETT. Can I ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question?

Mr. MACON (continuing). And for that reason I will insist on my objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman tell me what good is going to be accomplished?

Mr. MACON. This good, sir: Each Member will have an opportunity of reading this conference report, which they have not yet had an opportunity of doing.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is printed in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. MACON. The conference report?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MACON. I do not know how it got there. It was only made this morning.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was made in the Senate yesterday and is in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. MACON. I will say that I was not aware of the fact. I have not read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning, and I prefer that the matter shall go over until Monday, so that we can not only read the report of the conference committee, but also read the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], which I am sure was very intelligent, but which I could not hear on account of the confusion caused by the conversation of Members around me, and I think every other Member of the House would like to read what the gentleman said in regard to the conference report, also.

Mr. CANNON. It has been suggested to me that the gentleman speaks about the session on Monday next. I do not know whether the House will adjourn until Wednesday next or not. It certainly will not if the point of no quorum is made, because it would require a quorum; and evidently there is not a quorum in the city, and evidently there will not be a quorum on Monday.

So far as I am concerned, I do not intend to make the point of no quorum. I would make a point of no quorum if motion should be made to adjourn until Wednesday next, provided it would be a point that would bear fruit; but we all know that there will be no quorum on Monday, and, I apprehend, even not on Wednesday. So, following the suggestion that may have been made, I have no intention of making a point of no quorum unless some matter of legislation should be proposed where I thought a quorum ought to be present.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, this House has proceeded a thousand times without a quorum in the matter of enacting proper legislation, and I do not see why it should not do so again if the legislation were understood. I certainly would not raise a point of no quorum to legislation which I thought was proper, if I understood it, and it is not my purpose to do that now, unless improper legislation, or legislation that is not properly understood by Members of the House, is urged for its consideration. And I can see no harm, if the House is to adjourn over until Wednesday, in allowing this matter to go over until that time, so that every Member can have an opportunity, if he desires, to read the conference report, together with the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in support of it, which, I am sure, is good. For that reason I insist upon my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas objects. The conference report and accompanying statement will be printed in the RECORD.

INVESTIGATION OF THE SUGAR TRUST.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 239.

Resolved, That the special committee created under the provisions of House resolution No. 157 be authorized to sit, as a whole or by subcommittee, at such places as it may deem necessary.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, just in brief explanation of this resolution——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what did the gentleman state? I did not catch the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. The resolution authorizes the special committee appointed under resolution 157, commonly known as the Sugar Investigating Committee, to sit at such places, either as a whole or as a subcommittee, as it sees proper.

Mr. CANNON. The resolution has the approval of the committee?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; it has the approval of every member of the committee, every Democrat and every Republican on it.

Mr. Speaker, we have reached that point in our investigation where we have two very important witnesses to examine who are sick in New York. We think we will have to go there to take their testimony and also to examine a voluminous mass of records and papers and books and correspondence, which might require, maybe, a freight car to bring down here. The expense to which the committee will be subjected to on account of this will not be considerable, and in addition to that the amount of expenses which the committee can incur has already been limited by the House. I think this is only a formal resolution, and I hope no gentleman will interfere with it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consume six or seven minutes in making a personal statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to consume six or seven minutes in making a personal statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, before making the statement which I desire to make, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that he read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a colloquy that occurred on the 12th of this month.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another matter for a moment. I should like to ask, if proper to do so, and I presume it is, whether the conference committee on House joint resolution 39 can advise me if there is likely to be a report from that committee soon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The chairman of the conference committee is not in the Senate Chamber at the present time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not proper to discuss in the House anything that took place at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. What is the point of order?

Mr. DALZELL. The point of order is that it is out of order to discuss anything that takes place at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. To read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. DALZELL. I think so.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman obtained unanimous consent.

Mr. DALZELL. There can be no unanimous consent in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It is not my purpose to reflect on anybody or to criticize anybody, but I merely desire to lay a foundation for the statement I want to make. If there is objection, however, I will forego the reading of the RECORD and also the reading of the RECORD of the 12th, which I expected to have read. But I will state, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and others who may be interested, that the colloquy which has occurred elsewhere than in this Chamber is somewhat misleading.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be misunderstood. I have no interest in the matter at all. I am simply anxious that a precedent shall not be established.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I only wanted to make my statement more intelligible and more clearly understood.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think we ought to establish the precedent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would prefer not to rule on the point of order.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman makes the point of order, I will withdraw the RECORD which I desired to have read.

Mr. DALZELL. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on the 12th of this month there was a colloquy somewhere, not in this Chamber, referring to the failure of the conferees of two bodies to meet and consider House joint resolution No. 39, relating to the election of Senators by direct vote.

In a colloquy which occurred, not here but elsewhere, it was stated that the universal custom had been for members of a certain body having many members to appear at the door of another body having a much smaller number and let it be known that the conferees of this other body were ready to confer with the conferees of the smaller body, and that certain gentlemen appointed on a conference committee had been resting quietly for 10 days or such a matter waiting for the members from the larger body to go somewhere and make such an announcement.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that immediately after the Speaker of this House appointed conferees on the resolution referred to I myself went to another body, and I violated no rule of the House in going into that body, and announced to one member of that conference committee that the House conferees were ready to meet with them then, at any time, and to confer; and I was told by that member with whom I was talking that the chairman of the conferees appointed in the other legislative body was then temporarily absent, but that when he returned he would be advised and we would be notified of a time and place to meet.

I want to say further that following that up, I appeared in a distant portion of this Capitol every day, where gentlemen were assembled and transacting business until I left town on a committee appointed by the Speaker, and sat around there hoping that some Senator would advise me they were ready; but I have not until this day, until I read the RECORD this morning, found that they were waiting upon us.

Now, I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the conferees on the part of the House, my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONRY], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] are both absent from the city, and have been probably most of the time since the conferees were appointed; but in justice to them, I want to say further that before leaving town they conferred with me, advised me where they would be, so that they could be reached by wire, and assured me they would return here immediately upon telegraphic notice that the conference had been set, so they are practically in attendance.

I want to make one other statement, in order that it may not be understood that the House conferees are derelict in duty. I want to say that the House conferees, all of them, are ready now, and will be ready each and every day from 9 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the evening, to meet with gentlemen in some other body to confer upon this bill and report back here, if they will agree to it, a resolution which will meet with the approval of this House and of the entire country.

I want it distinctly understood, Mr. Speaker, that the House has not been derelict, but, on the contrary, has been somewhat persistent in its efforts to secure a conference, and before nightfall I shall take occasion to advise each of the conferees of another body that the conferees of this body are ready to meet with them whenever they consent to meet. [Applause.]

CERTAIN HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent and to preface it with a brief statement.

I have introduced House joint resolution 130, to provide for the payment of the compensation of pages, telephone operators, employees of the House, and temporary messengers for the post office for the months of July and August, and, in addition, $2,000 for the folding of speeches.

We have provided for these employees until the 30th of June last. As it is a matter that is largely formal in some respects, and as a quorum of the Committee on Appropriations is not in the city, I wish to ask unanimous consent to discharge that committee from the consideration of the resolution and to consider it at this time. Provision for the Senate employees was made by the Senate upon the bill which was reported a short time since from the conferees. I first ask that the bill may be read, and then that the request may be submitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 130, making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress.

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the following purposes:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For the following employees for the month of July, 1911, and until the adjournment of the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, namely:

For 46 pages, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, 1 press gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each;

Seven messengers in the post office, at the rate of $100 per month each;

Three telephone operators, at the rate of $75 per month each;

In all, $8,750, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, to continue available during the fiscal year 1912, $2,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York, that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from further consideration of House joint resolution 130, and that it be considered in the House at this time as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk again reported the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TREATMENT OF CITIZENS OF UNITED STATES IN RUSSIA.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I have received from the secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a copy of a joint resolution passed by the great and general court of that Commonwealth, which I beg the indulgence of the House to read at this time, and which is as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
House of Representatives, June 22, 1911.

Ordered, That the general court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, speaking for the people of the Commonwealth, does hereby express its sense that uniform treatment and protection should be accorded to every American citizen, regardless of race, color, creed, or religious faith, and that every earnest and peaceful effort should be made by the executive department of this Government to secure from the Governments of all other countries uniformity of treatment and protection to American citizens holding passports duly issued by the authorities of the United States, in order that all American citizens shall have guaranteed freedom of travel and sojourn, without regard to race, color, creed, or religious faith, in all countries holding friendly relations with the United States, and that in every country, at least equal rights and privileges be granted to all such American citizens as are granted to the citizens of any other country; and be it further

Ordered, That the United States Government be, and hereby is, strongly urged to exert all possible means to procure either an amendment to the present treaty with Russia or a new treaty with that country by which American citizens, regardless of race, color, creed, or religious faith, resorting to that country for peaceful and legitimate purposes of travel, business, or domicile, shall no longer be treated with discrimination; and be it further

Ordered, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their efforts to bring about this highly desirable result; and be it further Ordered, That the secretary of the Commonwealth be requested to transmit a copy of these orders to the President of the United States, to each member of his Cabinet, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Sent up for concurrence.

JAMES W. KIMBALL, Clerk.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Boston, June 30, 1911.

A true copy.
Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the order of the senate and house of representatives, the Great and General Court of Massachusetts, I have introduced the following joint resolution:

A resolution terminating the treaty between the United States of America and Russia concluded at St. Petersburg December 18, 1832, and directing the attention of the State Department to certain resolutions of the Great and General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Resolved, etc., That the treaty of 1832 between the Governments of the United States of America and Russia be, and the same hereby is, terminated, because of the discrimination by the Government of Russia in the administration of said treaty between American citizens, and that the attention of the State Department is respectfully directed to the resolution of the Great and General Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in relation to the matter of discrimination between American citizens traveling in Russia.

Mr. Speaker, in the limited time now allotted to me I may simply say I rejoice that the great and general court of that illustrious Commonwealth has taken notice of a condition of affairs which, in my judgment, should no longer be tolerated in the matter of the treatment of American citizens in Russia.

I sincerely hope that this Government, following the lead of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts again, as it has with such great advantage followed her in the past, may hear the voice of the great and general court in its expression of the views of the people of the State in this matter to the end that these outrages may soon be ended. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I heard a gentleman awhile ago refer to "some other body." I assume he meant the Senate, but he did not say the Senate. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks about "some citizens." What citizens? Does the gentleman mean the Jews, who are reported as being persecuted? I assume so, but the gentleman does not say so.

Mr. MURRAY. In the equality of citizenship which we have in the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, I make no distinction between American citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Let us know who they are. I quite agree with the gentleman's purpose.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman comes from Pennsylvania, and I may say to him that not only are American citizens who adhere to the Jewish faith excluded by the Russian Government but less than two years ago the Roman Catholic bishop of Scranton, Pa., was also insulted in the same way. [Applause.] Let me read to the House part of a letter from Bishop Hoban's secretary to Mr. Louis Marshall, of New York:

The right reverend bishop wishes me to say that he is in hearty accord with the movement started by your committee. It was only a year and a half ago that he himself was prohibited from entering Russia for only a two days' visit. As you no doubt know, Catholic priests in general are prohibited from entering Russia. He wishes your movement every success.

Mr. Speaker, the statesmen who sat before us in the Congress of this country were successful in their struggle to establish here a government that guarantees to its citizens equality before the law and freedom of religious worship. I know I need not quote in this presence those sections of our Constitution that were written to incorporate in the law of our land the American idea of complete independence for every person in the matter of religion.

The mention of the subject must bring to the mind of every Member the absolute prohibition of the Constitution that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," and other provisions that are equally clear.

The treaty of 1832 with Russia is as much a part of the law of the land as any provision of the Constitution, as any law of the United States, because the Constitution expressly says that a treaty made under the authority of the United States shall be so. We know that under this treaty discriminations are made between American citizens by Russia, and some of us insist that the time has come to call a halt.

I have therefore introduced my resolution, and I sincerely hope that its adoption may be added to the list of legislative achievements of this Sixty-second Congress.

ASTORIA CENTENNIAL.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, the city of Astoria, Oreg., will celebrate in a fitting manner, by a centennial, to open on August 10 and to close on September 9, 1911, the one hundredth anniversary of its settlement.

This is the first time within my knowledge where any city has held an exposition of national importance without calling upon Congress for some financial assistance, but in this case the city of Astoria is going to hold such a celebration without asking the Federal Government for any aid of that character; but there is a bill which has passed the Senate donating the use of some Army tents to the city to help accommodate the large crowds that are expected, and when that bill comes up on the floor of the House in a few days I trust there will be no objection to it.

CAUSE FOR CELEBRATION.

Ordinarily when a city grows to be 100 years old the event is of special interest only to its inhabitants. But sometimes such an anniversary reminds the Nation of an important and happy period in its history, and results in general felicitation and rejoicing. That will be true of the one hundredth birthday of the city of Astoria.

The reason for the celebration is that the founding of Astoria by an American colony in 1811 marked the first white settlement in the Oregon country, and later contributed materially toward the confirmation of the title of the United States to that territory over the rival claims of Great Britain.

Both Great Britain and the United States claimed Oregon from 1792 to 1846, when the title was definitely and finally vested in the latter. Both countries claimed priority of discovery and priority of settlement.

DISCOVERY OF THE COLUMBIA AND THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPEDITION.

In 1792 Capt. Gray, of Boston, discovered and christened the Columbia River, giving it the name of his ship. A little later during the same year Capt. Vancouver, of a British ship, having been told by Capt. Gray of his discovery, also crossed the Columbia bar and explored the river to a point near where Vancouver, Wash., is now located. In 1804 and 1805 Lewis and Clark headed the famous American expedition sent out by President Jefferson, and they explored thoroughly the heart of the Oregon country, coming in by way of the headwaters of the Missouri, crossing the Rockies, and going down the Snake River to the Columbia, and thence along the Columbia to the Pacific Ocean.

The great achievement of Lewis and Clark will live in history, and its one hundredth anniversary has already been celebrated by the Lewis and Clark Exposition, which was held at Portland in 1905. That exposition, it may be said in passing, was one of the most successful ever held in the United States.

SETTLEMENT AND CAPTURE OF ASTORIA.

The settlement of Astoria in 1811 by the American colony sent there from New York by John Jacob Astor and his associates did not prove a financial success. Two years later Mr. Astor's partners at Astoria sold out to his rival, the Northwest Fur Trading Co., of Canada. This company was shortly afterwards absorbed by the Hudson Bay Co., also a British corporation. During the War of 1812 the British dispatched a ship to Astoria and went through the form of capturing the post from the United States, but as it was already under the control of the Canadian company the only ceremony consisted in running up the British flag and renaming the post Fort George. The issues of the war of 1812 having been decided in favor of the United States, it became necessary under the treaty of Ghent for the British to restore Astoria to the Americans, which was done in 1818, and it was thereupon renamed Astoria.

During the 28 years following, or until 1846, Oregon was jointly occupied by the Americans and the Canadians. The powerful influence of the Hudson Bay Co. was exerted in favor of permanent British occupancy. The Americans were reenforced by occasional immigrants and missionaries from the Eastern and border States.

HISTORIC MEETING AT CHAMPOEG.

The white inhabitants of the disputed territory held a public meeting in an open field at Champoeg, in the Willamette Valley, on May 2, 1843, for the purpose of deciding whether they would organize a provisional government and declare allegiance to the United States. Had the meeting decided otherwise, it would have been construed as meaning that the inhabitants of the Territory were more friendly to Canada than to this country. A committee had been previously appointed to consider the matter and report at this meeting. The committee had prepared a report declaring in favor of organization. The Hudson Bay Co. had its employees at the meeting, and all were instructed to vote against organization. Immediately after the meeting was called to order a motion was made to adopt the report of the committee. The question being put, the chairman declared the motion lost. Old Joe Meek, a former Missourian, demanded a division, and stepping off to one side called upon all who were in favor of the United States to line up with him. The result of that vote was 52 for organization and only 50 against it. [Applause.] F. X. Matthieu, a French Canadian, who is still living in Oregon, was present and voted in favor of the United States. The provisional government was organized.

STATES CARVED FROM "OREGON COUNTRY."

Out of the "Oregon country" we have carved the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and parts of Montana and Wyoming. Had it not been for Joe Meek and F. X. Matthieu at Champoeg, the delegations in this Congress from the Northwest might now be at Toronto serving as members of the Canadian Parliament from the Province of Oregon. In that case it is safe to say that they would all be heartily in favor of Canadian reciprocity. [Laughter.] Joe Meek was a native of Virginia. He went to Missouri in 1829 and to Oregon in 1840. Matthieu went from Canada to Missouri in 1839 and to Oregon in 1840.

To fully realize the benefits this Nation derived by the acquisition of Oregon it is necessary to see that country. It is the most delightful part of the United States in which to live. East of the Cascade Mountains are the rolling prairies, the irrigated and irrigable areas, the expansive wheat and fruit belt, the cattle and sheep ranches, and the yellow-pine forests. Between the summit of the Cascades and the Pacific Ocean lies the Switzerland of America. The mighty surf beats upon the west coast both winter and summer and sends into the interior balmy breezes, mixed with salt air, to invigorate and make happy the fortunate residents. Snowcapped mountains are always in view, and the evergreen forests and crystal rivers form a picture that is truly "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." Astoria invites the country to see and enjoy all of these things during the present year.

OREGON'S INDIAN LEGENDRY.

I must add here a word about the Indian romance and legendry of the old Oregon country, even a slight knowledge of which will add to the pleasure of a visit there. In the city park at Portland stands a beautiful statue of Sacajawea, the Indian woman, who, bearing her child in her arms, acted as guide and interpreter for the Lewis and Clark expedition.

A hundred and fifty miles east of Astoria, on the Columbia River, may be seen the evidences of what was once a natural bridge. The Indians called it the "Bridge of the Gods." Their legend recites that when the bridge fell into the river the gods could no longer cross to help them in their battles.

A few hundred years ago a proud and powerful tribe, in what is now western Oregon, was the Willamettes. Though they are practically extinct to-day, the river by that name, flowing through the most populous section of the State and through the heart of the city of Portland, will serve better than any monument to keep fresh in the minds of the people the fact that the Willamettes once resided there. The names of many other tribes are preserved in a similar manner.

The greatest character of Oregon during the prehistoric days was Chief Multnomah. He was tall, sinewy, and brave. He was made head chief over all the tribal chiefs of western Oregon. It is also said that Multnomah had a daughter, named Wallulah, and that she was famed for her grace and beauty. The name of Multnomah is safely embalmed in history. The county in which Portland is located is named for him. The Multnomah Amateur Athletic Club, one of the largest and finest organizations of the kind in the world, also chose its name in recognition of the courage and feats of endurance of this departed chieftain.

OREGON THE ONLY PORTION OF THE UNITED STATES ACQUIRED BY RIGHT OF DISCOVERY.

It is a singular fact, worthy of note, that the Oregon country is the only part of the United States that was acquired by discovery and settlement. When Capt. Gray, on May 7, 1792, sailing up the west coast of this continent, sighted through the breakers from the masthead of his ship the placid waters of the Columbia River, destiny had decreed that Oregon should become a part of the territory of the United States. Under full sail Capt. Gray crossed the Columbia bar and planted the stars and stripes near the present site of Astoria. It had been 300 years since the discovery of America, and during all that time this portion of the continent had remained unknown. During all that time the mighty Columbia had rolled on to the sea, unseen and unadmired by any member of the white race.

The alluring charm of a new country will always cling to Oregon. Her gentle rainfall will keep fresh and green her magnificent forests throughout the ages. An everpresent longing in the human breast to commune with primitive nature caused the pioneers of America to push forward till civilization, with every modern convenience, was established upon the Pacific coast. There is no longer any "new country" to go to. But God, in His supreme wisdom, has decreed that Oregon, with her snowcapped mountain peaks, and her rugged coast with its miles of hard sand beach, washed by the foaming surf of the Pacific, shall remain young and beautiful and romantic, to gratify the loftiest desires of humanity so long as the world shall last. [Applause.]

OREGON & CALIFORNIA LAND GRANT SUIT.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, the biggest real estate suit ever filed is the case of the United States against the Oregon & California Railroad Co., now pending in the Federal court at Portland, Oreg.

The lands involved, aggregating 2,300,000 acres, were granted by Congress upon the express provision that the railroad company would sell the same to actual settlers.

The language of the act of April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. L., 47), by which most of these lands were granted, reads:

And provided further, That the lands granted by the act aforesaid shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than one-quarter section to one purchaser, and for a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

The act of May 4, 1870 (16 Stat. L., 94), by which the remaining lands were granted, reads:

Said alternate sections of land granted by this act * * * shall be sold by the company only to actual settlers in quantities not exceeding 160 acres, or a quarter section, to any one settler, and at prices not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

There is no reason, moral or legal, why the terms of these acts should not be enforced to the letter.

PROSPECTIVE SETTLERS SHOULD BEWARE OF GRAFTERS.

It should be plainly understood, however, by prospective purchasers that the term "settler," under all the public-land laws, means a person actually residing on a given tract of land and making it his home. Those so-called "locators" throughout the country who have been filing applications on this land for nonsettlers are simply defrauding their victims out of the fees paid and they ought to be prosecuted by the Federal authorities for violation of the postal laws.

No person who has not gone upon a tract of this railroad land and built a house and moved in with the bona fide intention of making the land a home has any right to apply to the company to sell to him.

If the company should accept the application and tender of a person not an actual settler on the land, it would be violating the acts of Congress which require plainly that the lands shall be sold to actual settlers only.

The very law that requires the company to sell to actual settlers prohibits it from selling to anyone who is not an actual settler.

It is plain that no rights can be acquired by the presentation of an application to purchase by a nonsettler. Such an application would amount to nothing more nor less than a request upon the railroad company to violate the law.

CLEAR RIGHT OF SETTLERS TO GO UPON THE LANDS.

By necessary implication the acts of Congress making these grants confer the right upon any citizen who may so desire to go upon the lands, and to take up a tract not greater than a quarter section, and to establish a home thereon, without let or hindrance from the railroad company.

In the Senate, on February 2, 1870, when the bill which passed May 4, 1870, was under discussion, the following statement was made by Senator Williams, of Oregon, in reply to objections to the bill, which were urged by Senator Thurman, of Ohio:

Mr. WILLIAMS. The objection which the Senator makes to this bill is not available, for the reason that the bill provides expressly that every foot of the land shall be sold to actual settlers. The lands granted are as open, under the provisions of this bill, to actual settlers as they are under the preemption laws of the country.

February 19, 1870, when the bill was again under discussion, Senator Casserly, of Vermont, said:

Mr. CASSERLY. What is the theory of this bill? Its theory and its distinguishing feature, as I understood all along, is this: That notwithstanding the grant of this aid to this railroad company, the settlement of the lands by actual settlers shall proceed as if the grant had not been made. If that is not the theory of this bill, I have not understood it, and the Senator from Oregon will correct me if I am wrong.

In the House, on April 1, 1870, when the same bill was under consideration, the following statements were made:

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. The bill, I will state, is one in which the interests of the Government have been carefully guarded. There has never been a land grant in which those interests have been so carefully guarded as in this bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the bill make any provision in regard to actual settlers?

Mr. SMITH of Oregon. It provides that the land shall be sold only to actual settlers, in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to each person, and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre. It is the most carefully guarded bill ever presented to this House.

The bill was again considered in the House on April 29, 1870, and the following extracts from the debate will show that Congress understood exactly what it was doing when it passed the bill, and that it intended that the law should not be violated by the railroad company.

Mr. SARGENT. One word in regard to the policy of land grants for railroads in the future. If they can be carefully guarded, as this bill is, so that while they construct roads the lands shall also go to the settlers in limited quantities at small prices, then I am in favor of them. * * * The fault of the system heretofore has been that the grants have been made without restrictions to the companies, which could hold them indefinitely for a rise in value. By this means monopolies have been created and the settlers kept from the lands except on the even sections. But we propose to change all that, and do so by this bill. We compel the company to sell the lands only to actual settlers at not more than $2.50 per acre, and in lots of not more than 160 acres.

The only difference it makes to the settler is that he pays double the minimum for his land; but the proximity of a railroad is certainly an advantage that counterbalances the price. The gentleman's blind rage does not discriminate between this system and that which was unrestricted, and would leave the vast West that needs development a wilderness for the long future.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] also says that the lands along the Union Pacific now sell for $10 per acre. The lands that bring that price must be of a very limited quantity, but if they are worth that it is the road that has given the value, for without it they would be worthless. Under this bill the lands can never realize but $2.50 per acre to the company, even if the road makes them worth $100 per acre.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does this bill contain any provision that the lands granted shall be sold to actual settlers only?

Mr. FITCH. Yes, sir; the bill is carefully guarded in that respect.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MCCORMICK of Missouri. I do not, Mr. Speaker, propose to occupy more than a very few minutes. I wish to call the attention of the House to the land policy of the country, and the policy which is now governing the Committee on the Public Lands in this House. There seems to me no reason for that fear of landed monopolies which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] seems to entertain. This bill secures to the use of all actual settlers all the lands granted to the road, and the price is limited to $2.50 per acre, the lands to be sold in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to any one individual. It is impossible for any monopoly to grow up under such a system. * * *

ORIGIN OF MOVEMENT TO ENFORCE THE LAW.

Four years ago a movement was started in Oregon to compel the Oregon & California Railroad Co. to live up to the terms of the acts of Congress making the grant. The Oregon Legislature, in February, 1907, memoralized the President and Congress to take some action to break up this land monopoly, which was refusing to sell to settlers, and which had always refused to be bound by the terms of the acts of Congress under which it received the land. The company had previously sold 800,000 acres of the land to timber companies and others without regard to the terms of the acts of Congress. It had sold in large tracts and for such prices as it could get.

But the company had 2,300,000 acres of the original grant remaining unsold and subject to all the terms of the acts of Congress making the grant, and the object of the movement referred to was to compel the company to comply with the law as to these unsold lands or to forfeit the unsold lands to the Government.

SETTLERS START FIRST SUITS.

Sixty-five settlers went upon the lands in question in 1907. After building their houses and moving in they applied to the company's secretary at Portland to buy their claims in accordance with the acts of Congress. The company refused to sell, claiming, among other things, that the acts of April 10, 1869, and May 4, 1870, in so far as they required sales to settlers, were so vague, indefinite, and uncertain as to be unenforceable. Thereupon the settlers brought suits in the Federal court at Portland, in the fall of 1907, to compel the company to sell to them at $2.50 per acre. April 30, 1908, Congress, by joint resolution, authorized and directed the Attorney General to institute a suit on behalf of the Government. September 4, 1908, the Government filed a bill of complaint, asking that the 2,300,000 acres of unsold lands be forfeited to the Government, or that receivers be appointed to sell the lands in accordance with the terms of the grant.

The railroad company demurred to the complaints of the 65 settlers and to the Government's complaint. Several thousand applicants, who were nonsettlers, also filed a joint complaint, and this was demurred to by the company and very properly sustained by the court.

On April 24, 1911, the court overruled the railroad company's demurrer to the Government's complaint, but sustained the same as to the complaints of the 65 actual settlers. These settlers will appeal. I know whereof I speak, because I am their attorney. I filed the first suits that were ever brought to enforce the terms of this land grant, and I shall fight the case in behalf of the settlers with all the ability that I possess till it is decided by the Supreme Court. It does not matter much to my clients or to the people of Oregon whether the lands be forfeited to the Government or a decree entered requiring that they shall be sold to the settlers. We assume that in either case the lands will be sold to settlers eventually.

CONGRESS SHOULD WATCH LITIGATION.

The important thing for Congress to decide is whether the Department of Justice is pursuing the proper course in demanding a forfeiture or nothing, and in completely abandoning the alternative prayer in the Government's bill of complaint asking for the enforcement of the grant in terms in the event that a forfeiture shall be denied.

If the Department of Justice continues to pursue the course of "forfeiture or nothing," it will probably get nothing. But if it will urge the milder remedy of enforcement of the terms of the grant it will undoubtedly win. Therefore the people of Oregon want the Department of Justice to put forward with some force that view of the case, which, if adopted by the court, would result in a decree for enforcement of the terms of the grant. The special assistant to the Attorney General, who at present has sole charge of the litigation, has no faith in this view of the case. He abandoned the same at the hearing upon the demurrers.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Gladly.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to say to the gentleman I am very much interested in what the gentleman has said, because I have had occasion to look into that particular grant. I want to ask this question, Whether or not the action pending on behalf of the settlers will not fully protect their rights in case the Government should lose on its contention wherein it wants to have the grant set aside or nullified?

If the Government wins, then it becomes Government land, as I understand it, subject to any action that Congress may take in regard to its disposition. If the Government, however, should proceed on the alternative, as the gentleman suggests, would not the Government be proceeding exactly along the same line that the individual settlers are proceeding, and if that be true then the individual settlers, if they carry their case up, would protect that phase of it, would they not? Personally, I never could understand, although I did not see the brief or even the pleadings, but from just reading the law, how a court could hold that this railroad company would not be compelled to deed this land to actual settlers upon tender of the money when they established beyond any question of doubt that they were actual settlers.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In answer to the gentleman's suggestion, which I am very glad he made, I will say if it is true that these 65 settlers, nearly all of whom are without money, shall manage to find sufficient funds to prosecute this litigation on the theory of enforcement, and I shall continue to live and retain my health and strength to prosecute the case for them until it is decided six or eight years from now in the Supreme Court of the United States, that both theories will be presented. But the Government of the United States should not abandon the theory of enforcement and be permitted by Congress to pursue a false theory for six or eight years, until the railroad company has done exactly what it is expecting to do under this program—build up an equitable defense by the payment of taxes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may conclude his remarks.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Ten minutes will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon may proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the gentleman that I fully agree with him that the Government ought to have protected every interest possible. I do not want to be understood as saying anything else.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I realize the gentleman from Nebraska is on the right side of this case.

Mr. NORRIS. But I want to ask the gentleman now this question: Suppose the Government should have proceeded on the alternative line as well as the one upon which it did proceed and should have succeeded, still I take it the railroad company, if they wanted to do so, could refuse to give a settler a deed upon tender of money and proof of settlement. They would have to go into court anyway to get it. I do not see any way of avoiding that, as bad as it may appear, and hard for the settlers, too.

Mr. LAFFERTY. If these lands were granted to the railroad company by Congress in trust, as they undoubtedly were, the proper way of proceeding is to bring a bill of equity in the Federal court in Oregon and have receivers, or trustees, appointed, which are the same thing, to go ahead and dispose of that land in accordance with the law. In that way every one would be protected. The rules and regulations for the order in which settlement should be made would be provided for, and all that sort of thing. I make no objection to the special assistant to the Attorney General including the claim of forfeiture in his bill of complaint; but when that was put in, and I insisted that the other theory of enforcement be included, he did so, but at the trial he abandoned that theory. And I want to call your attention to some other things the Department of Justice has been doing for the past two or three years.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman concludes his remarks, will he have the kindness to state what legislation he desires as the attorney—what legislation he desires, not only as the Representative of the people of his district but as the attorney for his clients, namely, these settlers?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire legislation on the part of this Congress that will secure the appointment of additional special counsel to aid in prosecuting this case in court, and the reasons therefor I will give you.

In view of the facts that I have stated I have introduced a resolution directing the Attorney General to employ at least one resident attorney of the State of Oregon as associate counsel in behalf of the Government to aid in the further prosecution of this land-grant suit. I hope the resolution will be reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary and that it will be passed.

There are other reasons for employing an Oregon attorney to assist in the case aside from the fact that the enforcement theory, as well as the forfeiture theory, ought to be presented to the court. The case involves too much work for one man. The case is dragging. That is putting it mildly, I will say, for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Why for my benefit more than for anybody else's benefit?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Because the gentleman intimated that I might be here for selfish reasons in addition to official reasons in representing the people.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. I asked my question in perfect good faith.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Then I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The demurrers were argued in March, 1909, and the Government did not file its brief upon that argument till December, 1910, nearly two years later, although only four months were allowed by the order of the court for filing briefs. When I was in Washington in April, 1910, I drafted a resolution directing the Attorney General to file his brief, and the same was introduced in the House April 28, 1910 (H. J. Res. 129), by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], and was introduced in the Senate, with a slight amendment, the following day by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon.

The case ought not to be delayed. The litigation should not proceed upon the single theory of forfeiture. The enforcement theory should be carried along through the courts, for that is the theory the Supreme Court may adopt. If the Supreme Court shall be limited to a decision either for an absolute forfeiture or a decision in favor of dismissing the bill of complaint it may dismiss the bill.

ENFORCEMENT, NOT FORFEITURE, PROPER REMEDY.

Under my view of the law there can be no forfeiture in this case, but the Government can enforce the terms of the grant, if it chooses to do so. There can be no forfeiture unless the grant was one of an estate upon condition. If the grant was one in trust, for the benefit of settlers, the only remedy is enforcement.

The grant created one of two things—an estate upon condition or a trust. If an estate upon condition, then the proper remedy for breach of the condition is forfeiture. But is this an estate upon condition? In the very nature of things it can not be. An estate upon condition is one where the land is granted upon a condition subsequent, which the grantee agrees to obey as one of the considerations of his right to hold and enjoy the estate. So long as the grantee refrains from violating the condition subsequent he holds and enjoys the estate. But here we find a provision in the grant that the grantee shall sell the lands. It shall part with all the lands. That could not be an estate upon condition. To so hold would be to take the novel position that the grantee could have the lands upon condition, but that such condition was one requiring the grantee to part with the lands.

Moreover, if this was a conveyance in trust there was no obligation on the part of the railroad to pay taxes. But the holder of an estate upon condition pays taxes in full. There is no presumption of law that a condition will ever be violated resulting in the forfeiture of the lands. For this same reason the holder of an estate upon condition may cut all the timber off the land. There is no reversioner who can claim waste, because there is no presumption that the land will ever revert. But in the case of a trust requiring that the land shall be passed on, the law contemplates that it shall be passed on in the same state in which it was vested in the trustee, and there could be no lawful cutting of timber.

If it be claimed that this grant created an estate upon condition in the railroad company, then the ridiculous anomaly must be admitted that as soon as the company would comply with the "condition" upon which it was to hold its estate it would have no estate left to hold. The answer is that the conveyance was one in trust and was not a conveyance of an estate upon condition.

RAILROAD COMPANY WAS MADE SALES AGENT FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

The railroad company was merely made the sales agent of the Government to sell these lands to settlers, as fast as they go upon the lands, at the Government price. The only interest that was granted to the railroad company was the right to collect the $2.50 per acre that otherwise would have been paid to the Government. The railroad company accepted this trust, and it has failed to comply with it. A court of equity can enforce the trust.

Personally I wish that a bona fide settler was on every quarter section of the unsold railroad lands that is fit for settlement. If settlers should go upon these lands and either the railroad company or the Government should try, by legal process, to put them off, it would bring to a test in court immediately the question as to whether those Senators and Congressmen knew what they were talking about when this grant was made who said that settlers would have a perfect right to go upon the lands.

If no settlers shall go upon the lands until the case is finally decided, and the decision should be in favor of enforcement of the terms of the grant, there would probably be a rush for the lands at that time that would be very unpleasant. It would be much better for the lands to be settled gradually. Yet no one wants to go out on one of these railroad claims and spend his money and his time for five or six years awaiting a decision of the case and then lose out, which he would do if the decision should be adverse. In view of these considerations it will be difficult for any lawyer to advise prospective settlers in this regard.

However, one thing would be safe. If any citizen can find a quarter section of this land that would afford him a pleasant home during the pendancy of the litigation, and upon which he could make a living, he would be fully justified in moving upon the same, for, in such case, the use of the land would be worth its occupancy, and if a final adverse decision should be rendered the settler would only have to vacate.

If the Supreme Court shall decide in favor of enforcement, it will probably direct the lower court to formulate rules and regulations providing for an orderly sale of the lands to settlers. Such rules would doubtless provide, among other things, that no settlements could lawfully be made after the promulgation of the court's decree, except in accordance with the rules to be so prescribed, and one of these rules would likely be that applicants should draw lots, under the supervision of the receivers of the court, and that they should be allowed to select lands to settle upon in the order of such drawing.

COUNTY COURTS SHOULD REFUSE TO ACCEPT TAXES.

During the pendancy of this litigation the various county courts of Oregon, for the counties wherein the lands are situated, should refuse to accept taxes from the railroad. The railroad company hopes, by delaying the case for several years, and by the payment of large sums in taxes during that time, to build up an equitable defense. When the first suits were filed four years ago the company had paid in taxes only between 25 and 50 cents an acre. The company had made no improvements on the land. The company had no defense when this litigation was started. Congress should not permit the Department of Justice to pursue a false theory and drag the case along for years, while the railroad company is building up a defense. Nor should the county courts of Oregon become parties to the building up of this defense by accepting taxes from the company.

MERITS OF THE CONTROVERSY.

The railroad company claims that any citizen would be exhibiting a lot of nerve who would now go upon a quarter section of these lands and ask the company to sell to him at $2.50 per acre when the lands are worth on an average $25 per acre. But it must be remembered that the settler would be giving far more than the $2.50 per acre for his land. He would in time and labor pay practically all the land is worth. The latter is the principal consideration that Congress intended should pass from the settler to the Government in acquiring the land. The $2.50 per acre to go to the railroad company was merely incidental. But if the settler is exhibiting nerve in seeking to acquire a home by giving for it practically all it is worth in time and money, what must be said of the railroad company which now refuses to be satisfied with the $2.50 per acre donated to it by Congress, but insists upon appropriating unto itself the entire fee-simple title to the land?

LENGTH OF RESIDENCE REQUIRED.

The law does not say how long a settler shall remain on a tract of this land after becoming an actual settler in order to be entitled to it under the acts of Congress. But the law can mean nothing less than that the settler shall take his claim in good faith for the purpose of making a home. A residence of sufficient length to appropriate the claim for a home and to improve it as such would be necessary. The shortest period of residence that has ever been required by any of the other public-land laws was 6 months, under the preemption law, and the shortest period of residence required by any of the public-land laws of the present day is 14 months, under the commutation clause of the homestead law. Under the homestead law itself 5 years' residence is necessary, but no cash payment is required under that law. The courts will construe the period of residence necessary on the railroad lands to mean a reasonable time, provided they enforce the terms of the grant, and in deciding what would be a reasonable time it is certain that the courts will not fix the period at less than what was required under the preemption law nor at more than that now required under the homestead law.

SETTLEMENT MUST BE IN GOOD FAITH.

A settler who is willing to meet these conditions and who can find a tract of the land that is worth his effort will, in my opinion, win out and get title, provided he shall settle upon the land in good faith and make it his home. No prospective settler should pay out a dollar for location fees. A man who can not go out and find a quarter section of this land by his own efforts would not have sufficient ability to make a home out of a claim that some locator had shown him. A description of the unsold railroad lands within any of the counties of western Oregon may be had on inspection of the records in the county clerks' offices. It will not matter how many "applications" may have been previously filed for any given tract by would-be settlers. The first man to actually settle in good faith on any particular tract is the man who will get the land, provided the law shall be enforced, and I hope and believe that it will be.

LANDS DISTRIBUTED THROUGH 18 COUNTIES.

While these lands are mostly timbered, rough, and mountainous, they are situated in the delightful climate of western Oregon, and are very rich and fertile. They are distributed among 18 counties, and extend from the Columbia River to the California line. This area contains water power to run trolley lines into every township, and some day that will be an accomplished fact. There is no reason why the timber should ever be entirely removed from these lands. From 20 to 40 acres would be ample out of each 160 acres for actual cultivation and orchard, while the other 120 or 140 acres could and should remain a natural park for the enjoyment of the owner and his family, only the ripe trees being cut from time to time, under modern methods of forestry, to allow the young timber to grow up and mature. A country home in this region would be ideal. It would contribute more to the happiness of any man than a life membership in Congress. Snow-capped mountains are in view every clear day, both winter and summer. The invigorating salt air of the Pacific is wafted inland by the balmy breezes of the Japan current. It is a country like that of which the poet wrote:

Where lavish nature in her best attire,
Gives forth sweet odors and alluring sights.

[Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. These land grants seem to have been made in 1870. The whole matter is entirely new to me; there is so much in the world to get outside of. I ask the question in good faith. Now since 1870 or at any other time, has the State of Oregon levied taxes on these lands, and if so, have they been paid, and how much have they amounted to per acre?

Mr. LAFFERTY. It amounted at the time these suits were instituted to less than 50 cents an acre.

Mr. CANNON. Annually or altogether?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Altogether. I will explain that.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I would be glad if the gentleman would.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The lands were granted in April, 1869, and in May, 1870, to aid in the building of two lines of railroad. But the last railroad was not completed until 1887. The railroad company did not file its applications to have its title to the greater part of the land certified until about 1895, and most of the lands have been patented within the last 16 years. But the patents recite that the lands were conveyed to the company in accordance with these acts of Congress. The Congress of the last generation in making this grant provided for the protection of the poor people of this country seeking homes, and the Congress of the present generation should see to it that the law is carried out in good faith. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may be allowed time sufficient to enable him to conclude his remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman some questions. It is a very interesting subject, and one which gentlemen will follow here with a great deal of interest.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will consent to an extension of five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I think that is right. It is a very interesting subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Oregon proceeding for five minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Oregon yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to ask the gentleman if most of this land is now occupied by settlers?

Mr. LAFFERTY. There are not over 65 settlers on the land. Immediately after the 65 settlers went on this land in 1907 the Government started out on this forfeiture theory, and has discouraged settlers from going on the land from that day until this, and the Attorney General's office gave out a statement through the Associated Press to the effect that settlers going on these lands would be regarded as trespassers, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., which owns the stock of the Oregon & California Railroad Co., gave out the same specific notice to the country, so that there are no settlers on this land except a portion of the original 65.

Mr. STERLING. The few that are there have title from the railroad?

Mr. LAFFERTY. No; they are trying to compel the railroad company to give them deeds under these acts of Congress. They are proceeding as joint plaintiffs with the Government——

Mr. STERLING. If the Government should succeed——

Mr. LAFFERTY. But they are being held back. The suit is being delayed. It is being dragged along at a snail-like pace. There was a motion made that the suits be consolidated. In that way they linked us up with this slow-moving process of the Department of Justice, and if this case goes along at its present rate we will not reach the Supreme Court within the next 18 years. If the case had been properly pushed from the start it would be in the Supreme Court now.

Mr. STERLING. If the Government should succeed in this suit for forfeiture, what would become of the claims of these settlers who are there? Would their claims be forfeited too?

Mr. LAFFERTY. The decree of the court might provide for protecting any settler, or it might not; but that part of it is not a serious question, only a few settlers being on the land.

Mr. NORRIS. If the court should decree a forfeiture, the land would then be Government land.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Subject to disposition by Congress the same as any other Government land.

Mr. NORRIS. And there is no doubt that Congress would protect those actual settlers who went on prior to these proceedings.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I do not think there is any doubt about that; but the danger to which I am trying to call the attention of the House is this: Not that I fear a forfeiture. If I knew they could get a forfeiture, or if I had any idea that they could get a forfeiture, I would say, "Go ahead with your forfeiture, I am with you." But that is a false theory. It is a theory that is being proposed upon the idea that this is a grant by Congress of an estate upon condition. Now you who are lawyers will so understand by a very brief explanation of that, which will convince you that the Government is pursuing a false theory. In an estate upon condition, where the condition is broken, the proper remedy is to proceed in court, if it is a private individual, by ejectment to recover. The grantor or his heirs may claim a forfeiture if they so elect, and reenter the land. They may do it by ejectment; or, if it is the Government, it can bring a suit in the Federal court to get possession. But such a suit must be based upon a condition subsequent in a grant, if it is an estate created upon condition. If this be held to be an estate upon condition—which the Supreme Court will never hold—the ridiculous position will have to be taken that Congress granted land to a railroad company as an estate upon condition, and that the condition inserted was one which, when it was complied with, would leave the railroad company without any estate. I tried to bring that up before the Federal court at Portland when the the special assistant to the Attorney General was presenting his argument. I said, "Why, Mr. Townsend, do you mean to say that this grant created an estate upon condition, and that you are therefore entitled to a forfeiture?" "Why, certainly, Mr. Lafferty." I said, "Here is an affirmative requirement that the railroad company shall part with the land, that it shall sell the land. Could that in heaven's name be a condition subsequent, when the very performance of the condition would annihilate the estate, would cause the grantee to be entirely divested of the land?"

He replied to me in this way: "Do you mean to say, Mr. Lafferty, that a restraint upon the power of alienation may not properly be made a condition subsequent?" I said, "Certainly it may." He said, "That is what this is. The law says, Thou shalt not—and he turned his attention to the court—Thou shalt not sell to anyone except an actual settler, and they have violated that."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. HAMLIN. I object.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman may have more time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. One minute, to complete the sentence.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will consent to one minute, but I think we should have the House here when so important a matter is being discussed.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman knows that he will not have the House here.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I appeal to my fellow-Missourian [Mr. HAMLIN]—I was originally from Missouri—to allow me one minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Then in regard to his answer that this was a restraint upon the power of alienation, my reply to that was this: If this be a restraint upon the power of alienation only, if it be in the negative, where would the Government be if the railroad company had not sold an acre of this land up to the present time? Being in the negative, you could never compel them affirmatively to do anything or to ever sell an acre of the land. They would have a land monopoly here which you have been talking against for two days and a half.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my request. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oregon be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad if the gentleman would tell us the present value of this land.

Mr. LAFFERTY. These lands are rough, mountainous, and most of them timbered. They are in the alternate, the odd numbered sections, on either side of the railroad, running from Portland to the California line, and along the line of another smaller railroad running west from Portland. The present value at a conservative estimate is $25 an acre.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Isn't there a great deal of that land valuable as agricultural land between the California line and Portland, up through the valley?

Mr. LAFFERTY. There is quite a bit of the land that is only covered with thin stands of timber. Some of it is valley land, but it is all very rich and fertile.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Has the general opinion that this was company land delayed the settlement of the country more or less?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Well, the fact that there was so much public land in Oregon has also had a tendency in that direction. Furthermore, the railroad company never at any time offered the lands for sale for settlement, but as soon as it got title, and in advance of getting its certificate of title, it made contracts with large timber companies to sell forty and fifty thousand acres in a tract, and it did sell lands as high as $15 an acre, and on the west side grant, the railroad company has received for that portion of its land sold what would amount to more than $2.50 an acre for the entire west side grant, as well as all taxes paid.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand from the investigation that I have been able to make of it, that the only reason why settlers did not go upon the land was that they knew in advance that they were going into a lawsuit if they went. The railroad company refused to accept everybody's money; in fact, gave everybody notice that they would not sell the land. Is that not true?

Mr. LAFFERTY. They have always held the position that these clauses requiring sales to settlers, inserted after eight hours' debate in this House and after being debated upon two occasions in the Senate, were so vague and uncertain and indefinite as not to be enforceable as a trust estate.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that the railroad company has assumed, even when they had the certificate, and then when they got the patent, that they owned the title, and that they ejected all those who entered upon these lands and hence no one could enter?

Mr. LAFFERTY. No one went on the lands until 1907.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman tell us briefly where these suits are pending now, and I would like to know, if the gentleman can give it to us, what ground the court took in sustaining the demurrer against the petition of these 65 settlers. What reason did the court give?

Mr. LAFFERTY. The case is now pending in the Federal court at Portland, awaiting the answer of the railroad company to the bill of complaint upon the merits. The agitation was started in 1907. The suit was filed in 1908. The demurrers were argued in 1909. On April 24, 1911, the court overruled the railroad company's demurrer to the Government's complaint. The court sustained the demurrer to the petition of the 65 settlers upon the theory advanced by the Government counsel that this was a grant of an estate upon a condition subsequent, for the breach of which only the grantor has a right to complain. Therefore the court held that the settlers, although admittedly on the land in good faith, had no standing in court to compel the company to sell to them at $2.50 an acre in the manner that the law provides the company shall sell. In other words the court adopted the theory of the Government counsel, which I claim is a false theory, and represents a program that will jeopardize the case if it is not changed by suggestion from Congress. The idea of saying that settlers have no right to go upon the lands, but that the company shall forfeit its interest for refusing to sell to settlers is absurd. The railroad then took 90 days in which to file an answer to the merits of the Government's bill of complaint, which will be due the 24th of this month.

The company will probably get an extension of time if the Government proceeds in the future as it has in the past, and will file its answer to the merits in about 12 or 18 months from now, and, going on at the same gait, the case will be tried upon its merits some five or six years from now in Portland; will be tried in the court of appeals in San Francisco some 10 years from now, and in the Supreme Court at the city of Washington some 15 or 20 years from now. That is what I am objecting to. This suit having been brought under authority of Congress, and Congress having the right to watch the litigation and direct the course of action of the Attorney General in this matter, I say an additional counsel ought to be employed. Moreover, the single and solitary Government attorney in charge of the case at the present time is being sent all over the country on other errands. He is going this summer to Alaska on the order of the Attorney General——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Has there been any application made for an assistant to the Department of Justice during this time?

Mr. LAFFERTY. No, there has been no suggestion of it anywhere, except the resolution I have introduced here, which, if passed, will require the Attorney General to employ at least one Oregon lawyer in the case. This certainly ought to be done. Oregon is more interested than any other State. Congress should give some impetus to this matter and push it along. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I thank the House for its courtesy.

APPENDIX.

List of unsold lands of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. received by it under the acts of April 10, 1869, and May 4, 1870, as the same appear in the Government's bill of complaint.

EAST SIDE GRANT.

[Act of Apr. 10, 1869.]

All of the lands of said east side grant are situated in the State of Oregon; the respective counties are indicated in the schedule.

The counties are arranged in the order in which they occur in the grant from west to east, commencing at the north. Thus arranged, they appear in the following order. For convenience, the total number of acres in each county is here stated:

	Acres.
Washington County	2,452.18
Multnomah County	8,120.00
Yamhill County	27,120.20
Clackamas County	89,162.07
Polk County	37,017.79
Marion County	30,256.00
Lincoln County	15,906.00
Benton County	53,626.99
Linn County	61,966.23
Lane County	299,606.00
Douglas County	616,843.14
Coos County	106,563.36
Curry County	7,844.64
Josephine County	167,480.98
Jackson County	441,791.15
Klamath County	43,015.00

REPORT OF MINORITY, COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent of the House to the extension to next Wednesday of the time to file, if desired, minority views (H. Rept. 59, pt. 2) of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. Might I add that I have consulted the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAMLIN], who has kindly remained here, and Mr. UNDERWOOD, the majority leader, and found them both agreeable to this request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request submitted by the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood the request is to next Wednesday?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. It is just exactly as I showed you. I wrote it out and showed you so that there would be no question about it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I did not catch the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WEDEMEYER. It is an extension of time to file views of the minority until next Wednesday. I wrote it out and showed it to the gentleman. I think it is perfectly clear.

Mr. CARTER. What bill is it?

Mr. WEDEMEYER. It is minority views of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] desires to submit a request.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a speech, and will probably not occupy the five minutes that the House has granted me. In 1836 Congress authorized one of the greatest exploring expeditions in the history of the world. This expedition set sail from Norfolk under the command of Lieut. Charles Wilkes, United States Navy, on the 10th of August, 1838. It was composed of eight vessels. It was the first undertaking of this character to which the Government had given assistance. It went out into what was then practically an unknown land and explored approximately one-fifth of the globe before its return. Lieut. Wilkes was selected to command this expedition on account of his scientific knowledge and other unusual attainments.

Among other things accomplished by this expedition was the discovery of the Antarctic Continent. One of the most interesting things accomplished by this expedition was the exploration of what was then known as the Oregon country. The rivers and mountains and the whole coast of North America, from Alaska to San Francisco, were thoroughly explored and mapped. The maps prepared by the expedition were so accurate that they are to-day the standard throughout much of the country explored. Not only did Lieut. Wilkes explore the Oregon country as to its rivers and mountains, but its inhabitants, and gave a description of the various Indian tribes and their customs and the number belonging to each tribe. He gave particular attention to the question that was then agitating this country, the boundary between the United States and the British possessions on the north. Upon this particular question Lieut. Wilkes made a most interesting and comprehensive report, consisting of some 44 closely written pages. This report, although the most interesting and in many respects the most valuable document resulting from this wonderful expedition, has never been published, although over 20 volumes were printed by Congress as the result of the knowledge gained upon this expedition. Lieut. Wilkes strongly objected to making the forty-ninth parallel the boundary between this country and Canada. He gave very convincing reasons why our Government should never consent that the boundary should be south of the Fraser River. He also prophesied that England would claim all the territory north of the mouth of the Columbia River, a prophecy that proved to be true. He also pointed out the great value and richness of the Oregon country. When the matter of the settlement of the boundary was under discussion, many men in Congress took the position that this country was of little value. Even the great Daniel Webster described it as a land of deserts and eternal snows, of shifting sands and sagebrush, fit to be inhabited only by the jack rabbit and the coyote. One southern Senator declared that he would not give a pinch of snuff for the entire Oregon country.

These public men could not have been ignorant of the report made by Lieut. Wilkes, and as we now read that report we are forced to the conclusion that some of the statesmen of that day were not more frank than are some at present and that they did not always give the true reasons for their actions. In the light of this Wilkes report these speeches must be accepted as largely pretense and a method of concealing the real reason for their action. I quote upon this particular point the closing paragraphs of Lieut. Wilkes's report:

To conclude, few portions of the globe, in my opinion, are to be found so rich in soil, diversified in surface, or capable of being rendered the happy abode of an industrious and civilized community.

For beauty of scenery and salubrity of climate it is not surpassed. It is peculiarly adapted for an agricultural and pastoral people, and no portion of the world beyond the Tropics is to be found that will yield so readily to the wants of man with moderate labor.

Certainly with this report on file in the Navy Department there was little excuse for the men of that day in declaring that the Oregon country was of no value.

The Hon. Thomas Prosch, of Seattle, one of the leading historians of the Northwest and one who has taken a great interest in all things relating to the history of that country, has gone to the expense of securing a copy of this report furnished me.

Congress in the past, during the time of the dispute over the question of the boundary between this country and Canada, several times demanded a copy of this report, but it was always refused upon the ground that the best interests of the country demanded that it be not made public. This was undoubtedly due to the opinions that Lieut. Wilkes expressed with regard to the attitude of England in reference to the boundary question, although it is stated in most diplomatic language. And I am constrained to believe that the suppression of its publication was due to some extent to the fact that at that time it was not deemed advisable to let the public know of what immense value this Oregon country was.

I now ask to extend my remarks by having published in the RECORD after almost 70 years this remarkable report by this remarkable man upon this most interesting question. This report is not only of interest to the Northwest, but it is a valuable historical contribution to the whole country. I also wish to publish with it a statement in regard to Lieut. Wilkes and this expedition and a letter from the librarian of the Navy Department, Mr. Charles W. Stewart.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire how large that report is?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not a very long report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman know how much it will cost to publish the report?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wish to publish it by extending my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

No. 104.

U. S. S. VINCENNES,
New York, June, 1842.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a report upon the Territory of Oregon, together with the maps referred to therein.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES WILKES,
Commander of Exploring Expedition.

To the Hon. A. P. APSKIN,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

OREGON TERRITORY.

The Territory embraced under the name of Oregon, and represented on the accompanying map, extends from latitude 42° north to that of 54° 40′ north and west of the Rocky Mountains.

Its natural boundaries, were they attended to, would confine it within the above geographical limits. On the east it has the range of Rocky Mountains along its whole extent; on the south those of the Klamet Range running on the parallel of 42° and dividing it from upper California; on the west the Pacific Ocean; and on the north the western trend of the Rocky Mountains and the chain of lakes near and along the parallels of 54° and 55′ north dividing it from the British Territory, and it is remarkable that within these limits all the rivers that flow through the Territory take their rise.

The Territory is divided into three natural belts or sections, viz:

First. That between the Pacific Ocean and Cascade Mountains, or western section.

Second. That between the Cascade Mountains and the Blue Mountain Range, or middle section.

Third. That between the Blue and Rocky Mountain chains, or eastern section, and this division will equally apply to the soil, climate, and productions.

The mountain ranges run for the most part in parallel lines with the coast, and rising in many places above the snow line (here found to be 6,500 feet) would naturally produce a difference of temperatures between them and also affect their productions.

Our surveys and explorations were confined for the most part to the two first, claiming more interest, being less known and more in accordance with my instructions.

MOUNTAINS.

The Cascade Range, or that nearest the coast, runs from the southern boundary on a parallel with the seacoast the whole length of the Territory, north and south, rising in many places in high peaks from 12,000 to 14,000 feet above the level of the sea in regular cones. Their distance from the coast line is from 100 to 150 miles, and they almost interrupt the communication between the sections except where the two great rivers, the Columbia and Fraser, force a passage through them.

There are a few mountain passes, but they are difficult and only to be attempted late in the spring and in the summer.

A smaller range (the Classic) lies to the north of the Columbia between the coast and the waters of Puget Sound and along the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

This has several high peaks which rise above the snow line, but from their proximity to the sea they are not at all times covered.

Their general direction is north and south, but there are many spurs or offsets that cause this portion to be very rugged.

The Blue Mountains are irregular in their course and occasionally interrupted, but generally trend from north by east to northeast and from south to southwest. In some parts they may be traced as spurs or offsets of the Rocky Mountains. Near the southern boundary they unite with the Klamet Range, which runs east and west from the Rocky Mountains.

The Rocky Mountains are too well known to need description. The different passes will, however, claim attention hereafter. North of 48° the ranges are nearly parallel and have the rivers flowing between them.

ISLANDS.

Attached to the territory are groups of islands bordering its northern coast. Among these are the large islands of Vancouver and Washington or Queen Charlotte, the former being 260 miles in length and 50 in breadth, containing about 15,000 square miles, and the latter 150 miles in length and 30 in breadth, containing 4,000 square miles. Though somewhat broken in surface their soil is said to be well adapted to agriculture.

They have many good harbors, and have long been the resort of those engaged in the fur trade. They enjoy a mild and salubrious climate, and have an abundance of fine fish frequenting their waters, which are taken in large quantities by the natives.

Coal of good quality is found here, specimens of which I obtained. The Hudson Bay Co. have made a trial of it, but owing to its having been taken from near the surface it was not very highly spoken of. Mines of mineral are also said to exist by those acquainted.

They both appear to be more densely inhabited than other portions of the territory. The natives are considered a treacherous race, particularly those in the vicinity of Johnstons Strait, and are to be closely watched when dealing with them.

At the southeast end of Vancouver there is a small archipelago of islands through which the Canal de Arro runs; they are for the most part inhabited, well wooded, and composed of granite and pudding stone, which appears to be the prevailing rock to the north of a line east and west of the Strait of Juan de Fuca. They are generally destitute of fresh water, have but few anchorages, and strong currents render navigation among them difficult.

The islands near the mainland, called on the maps Pitts Banks on the Prince Royal Islands, are of the same character and are only occasionally resorted to by the Indians for the purposes of fishing.

The coast of the mainland north of the parallel of 49° is broken up by numerous inlets, called canals, having perpendicular sides and very deep water in them, affording no harbors and but few commercial inducements to frequent.

The land is equally cut up by spurs from the Cascade Range, which here intersects the country in all directions, and prevents its adaptation to agriculture.

Its value is principally in its timber, and it is believed that few, if any, countries can compare with it in this respect.

There is no point on the coast where a settlement could be formed between Frazers River or 49° north and the northern boundary of 54° 40′ north that would be able to supply its own wants.

The Hudson Bay Co. have two posts within this section of the country, Fort McLaughlin in Mill Bank Sound, in latitude 52° 10′ north, and Fort Simpson, in latitude 54° 30′ north, within Dundas Island, and at the entrance of Chatham Sound, but they are solely posts for the fur trade of the coast, and are supplied twice a year with provisions, and so forth.

It is believed that the company has yet no establishment on any of the islands, but I understood it was in contemplation to make one on Vancouver Island in the vicinity of Nootka Sound or that of Clysquot.

Owing to the dense fogs the cost is extremely dangerous, and they render it at all times difficult to approach and navigate upon.

The interior of this portion of the territory is traversed by these ranges of mountains, with the several rivers which take their rise in them, and is probably unequaled for its ruggedness, and from all accounts incapable of anything like cultivation.

The Columbia in its trend to the westward under the parallel of 48° cuts off the central or Blue Mountain Range, which is not again met with until on the parallel of 45°. From 45° they trend away to the south and afterwards to the south and west until they fall into the Klamet Range. They are partially wooded.

RIVERS.

The Columbia claims the first notice. Its northern branch takes its rise in the Rocky Mountains in latitude 50° north, longitude 116° west; from thence it pursues a northern route to near McGillivarys Pass through the Rocky Mountains. At the boat encampment it is 2,300 feet above the level of the sea, where it receives two small tributaries—the Canoe River and that from the Committee's Punch Bowl; from thence it turns south, having some obstruction through its safe navigation, and receiving many tributaries in its course to Colville, among which are the Kootanie, or Flat Bow, and the Flat Head, or Clarke River, from the east, and that of Colville from the west.

It is bounded in all its course by a range of high mountains, well wooded, and in places expands into a line of lakes before it reaches Colville, where it is 2,200 feet above the level of the sea, having a fall of a little over 100 feet in 220 miles.

To the south of this it trends to the west, receiving the Spokane River from the east, which is not navigable, and takes its rise in the Lake of Cœur d'Alene. Thence it pursues a westerly course for about 60 miles, receiving several smaller streams, and at its bend to the south it is joined by the Okanogan, a river that has its source in a line of lakes, affording canoe and boat navigation of considerable extent to the north.

The Columbia thence passes to the south until it reaches Walla Walla, or the latitude of 45°, a distance of 160 miles, receiving the Piscous Yakaman and Point de Bois, or Entiyatecombe, from the west, which take their rise in the Cascade Range; and also its great southeastern branch, the Saptin, or Lewis, which has its source in the Rocky Mountains near our southern boundary, and brings a large quantity of water to increase its volume.

The Lewis is not navigable even for canoes, except in reaches. The rapids are extensive and of frequent occurrence, it generally passing between the Rocky Mountain spurs and the Blue Mountains.

It receives the Kooskooske, Salmon, and several other rivers from the east and west, the former from the Rocky Mountains, the latter from the Blue Mountains, and were it navigable would much facilitate the intercourse with this part of the country. Its length to its junction with the Columbia is 520 miles.

The Columbia at Walla Walla is 1,286 feet above the level of the sea and about 3,500 feet wide; it now takes its last turn to the westward, receiving the Uniattila, Quisnels, John Days, and Chates Rivers from the south and Cathlatses from the north, and pursuing its rapid course for 80 miles previous to passing through the range of Cascade Mountains in a series of falls and rapids that obstruct its flow and form insurmountable barriers to the passage of boats by water during the flood; these difficulties are, however, overcome by portages. From thence is had still-water navigation for 40 miles, where its course is again obstructed by rapids; then to the ocean, 120 miles, it is navigable for vessels of 12 feet draft of water at the lowest state of the river, though obstructed by many sand bars.

In this part it receives the Willamette from the south and the Cowlitz from the north. The former is navigable to the mouth of the Klackamus 20 miles, 3 miles below its falls, for small boats; the latter can not be called navigable except for a small part of the year during the flood, and then only for canoes and barges.

The width of the Columbia within 20 miles of its mouth is much increased, and it joins the ocean between Cape Disappointment and Point Adams, forming a sand spit from such by deposit and causing a dangerous bar, which greatly impedes its navigation and entrance.

Frazer River next claims attention. It takes its rise in the Rocky Mountains near the source of Canoe River, taking a westerly course of 80 miles. It then turns to the south, receiving the waters of Stuarts River, which rises in a chain of lakes near the northern boundary of the Territory.

It then pursues a southerly course, receiving the waters of the Chilestin, Pinkslitsa, and several small streams from the west, and those of Thompsons River, Quisnels, and other streams from the east (these take their rise in lakes, and a few may be navigated in canoes by making portages), and under the parallel of 49° it breaks through the Cascade Range in a succession of falls and rapids, and after a westerly course of 70 miles it empties into the Gulf of Georgia in the latitude of 49° 07′ north. This latter portion is navigable for vessels that can pass its bar drawing 12 feet of water; its whole length being 350 miles.

The Chikiles is next in importance. It has three sources among the range of hills that intersect the country north of the Columbia River. After a very tortuous course and receiving some smaller streams issuing from the lakes in the high ground near the headwaters of Hoods Canal and Puget Sound, it disembogues in Greys Harbor. It is not navigable except for canoes; its current is rapid and the stream much obstructed.

To the south of Columbia there are many small streams, but three of which deserve the name of rivers, the Ampqua, Too-too-tut-na (or Rouges River), and the Klamet, which latter empties into the ocean south of the parallel of 42°. None of these form harbors capable of receiving a vessel of more than 8 feet draft of water, and the bars for the most part of the year are impassable from the surf that sets in on the coast.

The character of the great rivers is peculiar, rapid and sunken much below the level of the country, with perpendicular banks; indeed, they are, as it were, in trenches, it being extremely difficult to get at the water in many places owing to the steep basaltic walls, and during their rise they are in places confined by walls, which back the water some distance, submerging islands and tracks of low prairie, having the appearance of extensive lakes.

LAKES.

There are in the various sections of the country many large and small lakes. The largest of these are the Okanogan Chain, Stuarts, Quisnells, and Kamloops in the northern section; the Flat Bow, Cœur d'Alene, and Kallushelm in the middle section; and those forming the headwaters of the large rivers in the eastern section.

The country is well watered, and there are but two places where an abundance, either from rivers, springs, or rivulets, can not be obtained.

The smaller lakes add much to the picturesque beauty of the country. They are generally at the headwaters of the smaller streams. The map will point out more particularly their extent and locality.

HARBORS.

All the harbors formed by the rivers on the seacoast are obstructed with extensive sand bars, which make them difficult to enter, and they are continually changing. The rivers bring down large quantities of sand, which on meeting with the ocean is deposited, causing a gradual increase of the impediment which already exists at their mouths. None of them can be deemed safe ports to enter.

The entrance to the Columbia is impracticable two-thirds of the year, and the difficulty of leaving equally great.

The north sands are rapidly increasing and extending farther to the south.

In the memory of several of those who have been longest in the country, the cape has been encroached upon some hundred feet by the sea and the north sand much extended to the south, and during my short experience nearly half an acre of the middle sand was washed away in the course of a few days. These are known to change every season.

The exploration of the Clatsop, or south channel, it is believed, will afford more safety to vessels capable of entering the river. The depth of water on the bar seems not to have changed, though the passage has become somewhat narrower.

Greys Harbor will admit of vessels of light draft of water (10 feet), but there is but little room in it on account of the extensive mud and sand flats. A survey was made of it, to which I refer for particulars.

This, however, is not the case with the harbors found within the Strait of Juan de Fuca, of which there are many, and no part of the world affords finer inland sounds or a greater number of harbors than can be found here capable of receiving the largest class of ships, and without a danger to them that is not visible. From the rise and fall of the tide (18 feet) all facilities are afforded for the erection of works for a great maritime nation. For further information our extensive surveys of these waters are referred to.

CLIMATE.

That of the western section is mild throughout the year, neither experiencing the cold of winter nor the heat of summer. By my experiments the mean temperature was found to be 54° F.

The prevailing winds in the summer are from northwest, and in the winter from southwest and southeast, which are tempestuous.

The winter is supposed to last from December to February; the rains usually begin to fall in November and last until March, but they are not heavy though frequent. Snow sometimes falls, but it seldom lays over three days.

The frosts are early, occurring in the latter part of August; this, however, is to be accounted for by the proximity of the mountains. A mountain or easterly wind invariably causes a great fall in the temperature. These winds are not frequent. During the summer of our operations I find but three days noted of easterly winds having occurred.

The nights are cold and affect the vegetation so far that corn will not ripen.

Fruit trees blossom early in April at Nisqually and Vancouver, and at the former on the 12th of May peas were a foot high and strawberries were in full blossom, and salad has already gone to seed 3 feet high.

The mean height of the barometer during our stay at Nisqually was 30.046 inches, and of the thermometer 66° 58′ F.

The greatest heat was 98° F. at 2 p. m. July 4, and at 4 a. m. of the same day it was 50° F. The lowest degree was 39° at 4 a. m. May 22, and at 5 p. m. of the same day the temperature was 72° F.

From June to September at Vancouver the mean height of the barometer was 30.32 inches and of the thermometer 66° 33′ F. Out of 160 days 96 were fair, 19 cloudy, and 11 rainy.

The rains are light. This is evident from the hills not being washed, but having a sward to their top although at great declivity.

The second or middle section is subject to droughts; during the summer the atmosphere is much dryer and warmer, and the winter much colder than in the western section. Its extremes of heat and cold are more frequent and greater, the mercury at times falling as low as 18° F. in the winter and rising to 108° F. in the shade in the summer, and a daily difference of temperature of about 40° F. It has been, however, found extremely salubrious, possessing a pure and healthy air.

The stations of the missionaries and posts of the Hudson Bay Co. have afforded one the means of obtaining information relative to the climate; although they have not kept full data, yet their observations afford a tolerably good knowledge of the weather.

In summer it is cooled by the strong westerly breezes to replace the vacuum produced by the heated prairie grounds. No dew falls in this section.

The climate of the third or easterly section is extremely variable; the temperature during the day, ranging from 50° to 60°, renders it unfit for agriculture, and there are but few places in its northern part where the climate would not effectually put a stop to its ever becoming settled.

In each day, from the best account, one has all the changes incident to spring, summer, autumn, and winter. There are places where small farms might be located, but they are few in number.

SOIL.

That of the first, or western, section varies in the northern part from a light-brown loam to a thin vegetable earth, with gravel and sand as the subsoil; in the middle parts, from a rich, heavy loam and auctious clay to a deep, heavy black loam on a trap rock; and in the southern the soil is generally good, ranging from a black vegetable loam to decomposed basalt, with stiff clay and portions of loose, gravelly soil. The hills are generally basalt, sandstone, and slate.

Between the Umpqua and the boundary the rocks are primitive, consisting of talcose, hornblende, and granite, and produce a gritty and poor soil. There are, however, some portions with rich prairies covered with oaks.

The soil of the second, or middle, section is for the most part a light, sandy loam, in the valleys rich alluvial, and the hills are generally barren.

The third, or eastern, section is a rocky, broken, and barren country, stupendous mountain spurs in all directions, and affording little level ground, with snow lying on the mountains nearly, if not quite, the whole year through.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTIONS, ETC.

The first section, for the most part, is a well-timbered country. It is intersected with the spurs or offsets from the Cascade Mountains, which render its surface much broken up; these are covered with a dense forest. It is well watered, and communication between the northern, southern, and middle parts is difficult on account of the various rivers, spurs of mountains, and so forth.

The timber consists of pines, firs, spruce, oaks (red and white), ash, arbutus, arbor vitæ, cedar, poplar, maple, willow, cherry, and yew, with a close undergrowth of hazel, rubus, roses, and so forth.

The richest and best soil is found on the second, or middle, prairie, and is best adapted for agriculture, the high and low being excellent for pasture land.

The line of woods runs on the east side and near the foot of the Cascade Range.

The climate and soil are admirably adapted for all kinds of grain—wheat, rye, oats, barley, peas, and so forth. Corn does not thrive in any part of this territory where it has been tried. Many fruits appear to succeed well, particularly the apple and pear. Vegetables thrive exceedingly well and yield most abundantly.

The surface of the middle section is about 1,000 feet above the level of the lower or western section, and is generally a rolling prairie country. That lying to the north of the parallel of 48° is very much broken, with mountain chains and rivers; consequently barren and very rugged. From the great and frequent changes in its temperature it is totally unfitted for agriculture, but is well filled with game of all kinds that are found in the country.

The mountain chains on the parallel of 48° are cut off by the Columbia, as before stated, leaving an extensive rolling country in the center of the territory, which is well adapted for grazing.

The southern part of this section is destitute of timber or wood, unless the worm wood, Artimesia, may be so called. To the north of the parallel of 49° it is covered with forests. Wheat and other grains grow well in the bottoms where they can be irrigated.

The soil in such places is rich and capable of producing most anything.

The missionaries have succeeded in getting good crops. Stock succeeds here even better than in the lower country, and, notwithstanding the severe cold, their cattle are not housed, nor is provender laid in for them, the country being sufficiently supplied with fodder in the natural hay that is abundant everywhere on the prairie, and is preferred by the cattle to the fresh grass of the bottoms.

No attempts at agriculture have been made in this section except at Fort Hall. The small grains thrive tolerably well, together with vegetables, and a sufficient quantity has been obtained to supply the wants of the post.

The ground is well adapted for grazing in the prairies, and, despite its changeable climate, stock is found to thrive well and endure the severity of the winters without protection. This section is exceedingly dry and arid, rains seldom falling and but little snow. The country is partially timbered and the soil much impregnated with salts. The missionary station on the Kooscoske, near the western line of this section, is thought by the missionaries to be a wet climate.

The soil along the river bottoms is generally alluvial, and would yield good crops were it not for the overflowings of the river, which check and kill the grain. Some of the finest portions of the land are thus unfitted for cultivation; they are generally covered with water before the banks are overflown in consequence of the quicksands that exist in them and through which the water percolates.

The rivers of this territory afford no fertilizing properties to the soil, but, on the contrary, are destitute of all substances, being perfectly clear and cold. The temperature of the Columbia in the latter part of May was 42° and in September 68°.

The rise of the streams from the Cascade Mountains usually takes place twice a year—in February and November from the rains; that of the Columbia in May and June from the melting of the snows. Sometimes it is very sudden, if heavy rains occur at that period, but usually it is gradual in reaching its greatest height about the 6th to the 15th of June.

Its perpendicular rise is from 18 to 20 feet at Vancouver, where a line of embankment has been thrown up to protect the lower prairie, but it has been gradually flooded, although the water has not risen within a few feet of its top, and has in most cases destroyed the crops; it is the intention to abandon its cultivation and devote it to pasturage.

The greatest rise in the Willamette takes place in February, and I was informed that it rose sometimes 20 to 25 feet, and quite suddenly in some places, but soon subsides. It occasionally causes much damage. Both the Willamette and Cowlitz in their lower sections are much swollen by the backing of their waters during the height of the Columbia and all their lower ground submerged. This puts an effectual bar to their being used for anything but pasturage, which is fine throughout the year, and used excepting in the season of the floods, when the cattle are driven to the high grounds.

My knowledge of the agriculture of this territory, it will be well to mention, is derived from visits being made to the various settlements, except Fort Langley and Fort Hall. That of the Indians on the different islands in Puget Sound and the Admiralty Inlet consists of potatoes principally, which are extremely fine and raised in great abundance, and now constitute a large portion of their food.

At Nisqually the Hudson Bay Co. had fine crops of wheat, oats, peas, potatoes, and so forth. The wheat, it was supposed, would yield 15 bushels to the acre. The farm has been two years under cultivation, and is principally intended for a grazing farm and dairy. They have now 70 milch cows, and make butter, and so forth, to supply their contract with the Russians.

The Cowlitz farm is also in the western section; the production of wheat is good, about 20 bushels to the acre; the ground, however, has just been brought under cultivation. They have here 600 acres, which are situated on the Cowlitz River, about 30 miles from the Columbia. The company is about to erect a saw and grist mill. This farm is finely situated, and the harvest of 1841 produced 7,000 bushels of wheat.

Several Canadians are also established here, who told me that they succeeded well with but little work. They have erected buildings, live comfortably, and work small farms of 50 acres.

I was told that the stock on this farm does not thrive so well as elsewhere. There are no low prairie grounds on that side of the river in the vicinity, and it is too far for them to resort to the Kamass plains, a fine grazing country a few miles distant, where the wolves would make sad depredations with the increase if not well watched.

The hilly portions of the country, although the soil in many parts is very good, yet it is so heavily timbered as to make it in the present state of the country valueless. This is also the case with many fine portions of level grounds, but there are large tracts of fine prairie suitable for cultivation and ready for the plow.

The Willamette Valley is supposed to be the finest portion of the country, though I am of opinion that many portions of it will be found far superior in the southern part of it. It is the largest settlement and is included within a distance of some 15 miles in the northern part of the valley. About 60 families are settled there, the industrious of whom appear to be thriving.

They are composed of American missionaries and the trappers and Canadians who were formerly servants of the Hudson Bay Co. All of them appear to be in good condition, but I was, on the whole, disappointed from the reports that had been made to me, not to find it in a state of greater forwardness, considering the advantages the missionaries have had.

In comparison with our own country, I should say that the labor required in this Territory for subsistence and to acquire wealth is in the proportion of one to three, or, in other words, a man must work through the year three times as long in the United States to gain the like completion. All the care of stock which occupies so much time with us requires no attention here, and on their rapid increase he would alone support himself.

The wheat of this valley yields 35 to 40 bushels for one town, or 20 to 30 bushels to the acre, its quality is superior to that grown in the United States, and its weight near 4 pounds to the bushel heavier. The above is the yield of new land, but it is believed that it will greatly exceed this after the third crop, when the land has been broken up and well tilled.

After passing into the middle section the climate undergoes a decided change; in place of the cool and moist atmosphere, one that is dry and arid is entered, and the crops suffer from drought. The only wood or bush seen is the wormwood (Artimesia), and this only in the neighborhood of the streams. All cultivation has to be more or less carried on by irrigation.

The country bordering the Columbia above the hills to the north and south, is the poorest in the Territory, and has no doubt lead many to look upon the middle section as perfectly useless to man. Twenty or 30 miles on either side of the river is so, but beyond that a fine grazing country exists, and in very many places there are portions of it that might be advantageously farmed.

On the banks of the Walla Walla, a small stream running into the Columbia, about 25 miles from the company's post, a missionary is established, who raises very fine wheat on its low bottoms and is enabled to use its waters for the purpose of irrigation. This is also the case at the mission establishment at Lapwai, on the Kooscooske, where fine crops are raised; grains and vegetables thrive remarkably well, and some fruits are raised.

In the northern part of this section, at Chimekaine, there is another missionary station near the Spokane, and at Colville the country is well adapted for agriculture, and it is successfully carried on.

Colville supplies all the northern posts, and the missionaries are doing well. The northern part of this section will be able to supply the whole with wood. Here also the changes of temperature are great during the 24 hours, but are not injurious to the small grain. The cultivation of fruits has not been successful.

FISHERIES.

It will be almost impossible to give an idea of the extensive fisheries in the rivers and on the coast; they all abound in salmon of the finest flavor, which run twice a year, from May until October, and appear inexhaustible; the whole population live upon them.

The Columbia produces the finest and probably affords the greatest numbers. There are some few of the branches of the Columbia that the spring fish do not enter, but they are plentifully supplied in the fall.

The great fishery of the Columbia is at The Dalles, but all the rivers are well supplied; the last one on the northern branch of the Columbia is near Colville, at the Kettle Falls, but they are found above this in the river and its tributaries.

In Fraser River they are said to be very numerous, but not so large; they are unable to get above the falls, some 80 miles from the sea.

In the rivers and sounds are found several kinds of salmon, salmon trout, sturgeon, cod, carp, sole, flounders, ray, perch, herring, lampery eels, and a kind of smelt called sprow, in great abundance; also large quantities of shellfish, viz, crabs, clams, oysters, mussels, and so forth, which are all used by the natives and constitute the greater proportion of their food.

Whales in numbers are found along the coast, and are frequently captured by the Indians in and at the north of the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

GAME.

Abundance of game exists, such as elk, deer, antelopes, bears, wolves, foxes, muskrats, martins, beavers, a few grizzly bears, and sifflines, a kind of rat which are eaten by the Canadians.

In the middle section, or that designated as the rolling prairie, no game is found. In the eastern section the buffalo is met with.

The fur-bearing animals are decreasing in number yearly, particularly south of the parallel of 48°. Indeed it is very doubtful whether they are sufficiently numerous to return the expenses of hunting them.

The Hudson Bay Co. have almost the exclusive monopoly on this business. They have decreased owing to being hunted without regard to season. This is not, however, the case to the north; there the company have been left to exercise their own rule and prevent the indiscriminate slaughter of the old and young and out of the proper season.

In the spring and fall the rivers are literally covered with geese, ducks, and so forth.

In the eastern section the buffalo abound and are hunted by the Oregon Indians, as well as the Blackfeet. Wolves are troublesome to the settlers, but they are not so numerous as formerly.

From the advantages this country possesses it bids fair to have an extensive commerce on advantageous terms with most parts of the Pacific.

It is well calculated to produce the following, which certainly in a few years after its settlement would become its staples, viz, furs, salted beef and pork, fish, grain, flour, wool, hides, tallow, lumber, and perhaps coal. A ready market for all these is now to be found in the Pacific, and in return for them sugars, coffee, and other tropical productions may be had at the Sandwich Islands—advantages that few new countries possess, viz, the facilities of a market and one that in time must become of immense extent.

MANUFACTURING POWER.

This country, it is believed, affords as many sites for water power as any other, and in many places within reach of its navigable waters.

The timber of the western section to the south of 49° is not so good as that of the north; this is imputed to the climate being milder and more changeable. A great difference is found between the north and south sides of the trees, the one being a hard and close grain, while the other is open and spongy.

To the north of the parallel of 49°, on Frazer River, an abundance of fine timber for spars of any dimensions is easily obtained.

There will always be a demand for the timber of this country at high prices throughout the Pacific. The oak is well adapted for ship timber, and abundance of ash, cedar, cypress, and arbor-vitæ may be had for fuel, fencing, etc.; and although the southern part of the middle section is destitute of timber it may be supplied from the eastern and northern parts by water carriage.

Intercommunication would at first appear to be difficult between the different parts of the country, but I take a different view of it. Stocks of all kinds thrive exceedingly well, and they will in consequence always abound in the Territory. The soil affords every advantage for the making of good roads, and in process of time transportation must be comparatively cheap.

SETTLEMENTS.

They consist principally of those belonging to the Hudson Bay Co., and where the missionaries have established themselves. They are as follows: In the western section Fort Simpson, Fort McLaughlin, Fort Langley, Nisqually, Cowlitz, Fort George, Vancouver, and Ampqua; Fort St. James, Barbine, Alexandria, Chilcothin, Kamloops (on Thompson River), Okanogan, Colville, and Walla Walla in the middle; and in the eastern Kootenni and Fort Hall. Fort Boise has been abandoned, as has also Kaima, a missionary settlement on the Kooscooske.

These are all small settlements, consisting of a palisade or picket with bastions at their corners around the houses and stores of the company, sufficient to protect them against the Indians, but in no way to be considered as forts. A few Indians have lodges near them who are dependent on the fort for their food and employment.

These forts, being situated for the most part near the great fisheries, are frequented by the Indians, who bring their furs to trade for blankets, and so forth, at the same time they come to lay in their yearly supply of salmon. Vancouver is the principal depot from which all supplies are furnished and returns made. At Vancouver the village is separated from the fort and near the river. In addition to its being the depot of the Hudson Bay Co., there is now attached to it the largest farm of the Puget Sound Co., the stockholders in which are generally the officers and servants of the Hudson Bay Co. They have now farms in successful operation at Vancouver, Cowlitz, Nisqually, Colville, Fort Langley, and the Fualtine Plains, about 10 miles from Vancouver, all of which are well stocked. They supply the Russian post at Sitka, under contract, with the variety of articles raised on them.

They have introduced large herds and flocks into the Territory from California, and during our stay there several thousands were imported. In this they are doing incalculable good to the Territory and rendering it more valuable to the future settlers; at the same time it exerts an influence in domesticating the Indians, not only by changing their habits, but food, and attaching them to a locality.

The Indians of this Territory are not a wandering race, as some have asserted, but change for food only, and each successive season will generally find them in their old haunts seeking it.

The settlements established by the missionaries are at the Willamette Falls and Valley; it is Nisqually and Clatsop in the western section, and at The Dalls, Walla Walla, Lakwai, and Chimekaine on the Spokane in the middle.

Those of the middle section are succeeding well, and, although little progress has been made in the conversion of Indians to Christianity, yet they have done much good in reforming some of their vices and teaching them some of the useful arts, particularly that of agriculture, which has had the effect, in a measure, to attach them to the soil, construct better houses, exchanging their corn, and so forth, with those who hunt, for Buffalo meat.

The men now rear and tend their cattle, plant their corn and potatoes, and the squaws attend to their household and employ themselves in knitting and weaving, which they have been taught.

They raise on their small patches corn, potatoes, melons, and so forth, irrigating the land for that purpose. There are many villages of Indians still existing, though greatly reduced in number from former estimates.

POPULATION.

It is extremely difficult to ascertain with accuracy the amount of population in the Territory, particularly of Indians, who change to their different abodes as the fishing seasons come around, and if not attended to would produce very erroneous results.

The following is believed to be very nearly the truth. If anything, it is overrated:

Vancouver and Washington Island	5,000
From the parallel of 50° to 54° 40′ north	2,000
Penns Cove, Whidbegs Island, and mainland opposite (Scatchat)	650
Hoods Canal (Suguamish and Toando)	500
At and about Okanogan	300
About Colville, Spokane, etc	450
Willamette Falls and Valley	275
Pillar Rock, Oak Point, and Col. R	300
Clallams:
Port Discovery	150
Port Townshead	70
New Dangerness	200
Walla Walla, including the Nezperces, Snakes, etc	1,100
Killamouks, north of Ampqua	400
Closset tribe: Cape Flattery, Queen Agthe, to Point Greenville	1,250
Blackfeet tribes that make excursions west of the Rocky Mountains	1,000
Birch Bay	300
Frazers River	500
Chenooks	200
Clatsops	220
At the Cascades	150
At The Dalles	250
Yakaman River	100
Chutes River	125
Ampquas	400
Rogues River	500
Klamets	300
Shastys	500
Kalapuyas	600
Nisqually	200
Chikilis and Puget Sound	700
Cowlitz Klackatacs	350
Port Orchard Suquamish	150
Total	19,204

The whole Oregon territory may be estimated as containing 20,000. Of whites, Canadians, and half-breeds there are between 700 and 800, of whom about 150 are Americans; the rest are settlers and the officers and servants of the company.

The Indians are rapidly decreasing in all parts of the country. The causes are supposed to be their rude treatment of diseases and the dissipated lives they lead.

The white American population, as far as I have been able to judge of them, are orderly, and some industrious, although they are, with the exception of the missionaries, men who have led for the most part dissolute lives.

The absence of spirits as long as it continues will probably secure them from other excesses. Very much to their credit, they have abandoned the use of spirituous liquors by consent of the whole community. I can not but view this territory as peculiarly liable to the vice of drunkenness. The ease with which the wants of man are obtained, the little labor required, and consequent opportunities of idleness will render it so. The settlers of the Willamette Valley have with a praiseworthy spirit engaged to prevent the establishment of distilleries, and there are yet no places where spirits can be bought, to my knowledge, in the territory.

It is highly creditable to the H. B. Co. that on a vessel arriving on the coast with spirits on board, in order to prevent its introduction they have purchased the whole, while at the same time their storehouses were filled with it. They have with praiseworthy zeal interdicted its being an article of trade, being well satisfied that it is contrary to their interests and demoralizing in its effects on all the tribes and people with whom they have to deal, rendering them difficult to manage, quarrelsome among themselves, and preventing their success in hunting.

Endeavors have likewise been made by the officers of the company to induce the Russians, on their side, to adopt their example and do away with it as an article of trade, but hitherto without success.

It no doubt has been one of the causes effecting the decrease of the native tribes, as it was formerly almost the only article of trade.

In the event of this territory being taken possession of, the necessity of circumscribing the use and sale of spirits can not be too strongly insisted upon by legal enactment, both to preserve order and avoid expense.

As far as the Indians have come under my notice, they are an inoffensive race, except perhaps those in the northern part; but the depredations committed on the whites may be traced to injuries received or from superstitious motives.

MISSIONARIES.

Little has yet been effected by them in Christianizing the natives. They are principally engaged in the cultivation of the mission farms and in the care of their own stock, in order to obtain flocks and herds for themselves, most of them having selected lands. As far as my personal observation went, in the part of the country where the missionaries reside there are very few Indians, and they seem more occupied with the settlement of the country and in agricultural pursuits than missionary labors.

When there, I made particular inquiries whether laws were necessary for their protection, and I feel fully satisfied that they require none at present. Besides the moral code it is their duty to inculcate, the Catholic portion of the settlement, who form a large majority of the inhabitants, are kept under control by their priest, who is supposed to act in mission with the others in the proper punishment of all bad conduct.

The boundary will next claim my attention.

In a former report to the honorable Secretary of the Navy I stated that the boundary formerly proposed, viz, that of the 49° latitude, ought not to be adopted, and the following are my reasons for it, viz:

First. That it affects the value of all that portion of the middle and eastern section south of that parallel.

Second. That it places the whole territory south of that parallel completely under the control and at the mercy of the nation who may possess the northern by giving the command of all the water and a free access into the heart of the territory at any moment.

Third. Giving up what must become one of the great highways into the interior of the territory altogether, viz, Frazers River.

Fourth. And also, to all intents and purposes, possession of the fine islands of Vancouver, thereby surrendering an equal right to navigate the waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca, and by its possession the whole command of the northern waters.

Fifth. Giving rise to endless disputes and difficulties after the location of the boundary and in the execution of the laws after it is settled.

Sixth. Affording and converting a portion of the territory which belongs to us into a resort and depot for a set of marauders and their goods, who may be employed at any time in acting against the laws and to the great detriment of the peace not only of this territory but of our Western States by exciting and supplying the Indians on our borders.

The boundary line on the 49° parallel would throw Frazers River without our territory, cut off and leave seven-eighths of the fine island of Vancouver in their possession, together with all the harbors, including those of Nootka, Clyoquet, and Natinat, which afford everything that could be desired as safe and good ports for naval establishment. They would not only command the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the inlets and sounds leading from it, but place the whole at any moment under their control by enabling them to reach and penetrate to the heart of the territory with a comparatively small force and destroy it and lay it waste.

The whole middle and part of the eastern section would be cut off from their supplies of timber by losing its northern part, from which it can only be supplied with an article of the first necessity both for fuel and building, rendering it dependent on a foreign state.

We should also give up what may be considered a storehouse of wealth in its forests, furs, and fisheries, containing an inexhaustible supply of the first and last of the best quality.

Endless difficulties would be created in settling the boundary, for Great Britain must or does know that the outlet from Frazers River by way of Johnstons Strait, between Vancouvers Island and the mainland, is not only difficult but dangerous to navigate from the rapidity of the currents and can not be made use of. She will, therefore, probably urge her claim to the southern line, say, the Columbia, as the boundary which they are desirous of holding, and are now doing all in their power to secure its permanent settlement through the Hudson Bay Co., and extending the laws by which she governs the Canadas over her own citizens settled in the territory; and by the delays of our Government hope to obtain such a foothold as will make it impossible to set aside their sovereignty in it. This, as far as I was enabled to perceive, is evidently their intention, being extremely desirous to appear as the larger claimants of the territory and to assert their right to the soil to the north of the Columbia River.

This boundary would subject the island of Vancouver to two sovereignties and, of course, their laws. It never could be surrendered by us without abandoning the great interest and safety of the territory. And it will be perceived how very prejudicial it would be if the British in possession of the northern section should establish free ports, and thus be enabled to counteract all our revenue laws, and so forth.

The contract for supplies with the Russians now enables the Hudson Bay Co. to purchase the grain and produce from the Willamette settlers, but in a short time it will be supplied by themselves through their great farms, and consequently the produce of settlers can obtain no market whatever, all trade being in the hands of that company.

The Puget Sound Co. are enabled to compete with and undersell all others from the low price of labor—£17 per annum—absence from duties, and the facilities of sending their products to market by the ships of the Hudson Bay Co., which hitherto have returned almost empty, the furs occupying but a small part of the vessel, which will hereafter be filled with hides and tallow; this must operate very prejudicially to the settlement and increase their hold on the territory.

I have stated these views in order to show the necessity of prompt action on the part of the Government in taking possession of the country in order to obviate difficulties that a longer delay will bring about and prevent many persons from settling advantageously.

For the military occupation of the country I conceive that it would be necessary to establish a post at some central point, viz, Walla Walla, and I herewith inclose you a topographical sketch of the surrounding country within 30 miles. As respects its position with reference to the country, you will be well informed by the map.

It appears to me to be peculiarly adapted to the general defense of the territory in order to preserve peace and quietness among the Indian tribes.

The Nez Percés, Snakes, and Blackfeet are those generally engaged in committing depredations on each other and requiring more looking after than those of the other tribes. They are in and around this section of country.

The facilities for maintaining a post and at a moderate expense are great; the river abounds with salmon during a greater part of the year and the herds thrive exceedingly well. Cattle are numerous, particularly horses, which are the best that the country affords. Grains of all kind flourish, and at about 25 miles distant the missionaries have an establishment from which I have but little doubt the troops could be supplied.

The climate is remarkably fine and healthy. There is, perhaps, no point from which operations could be carried on with so much facility to all parts of the territory as this, it being situated, as it were, at the forks of the two principal branches of the Columbia. Any number of horses could be kept at little or no expense, and a force could reach almost any part of the lower territory with the least possible delay.

The permanent land force I conceive necessary to keep this territory quiet and peaceable would be one company of dragoons and one of infantry, say, 200 men.

The only Indians of the country south of 49° who are disposed to make war upon the whites are the Klamets, residing on the southern borders of the territory along the Rouges and Klamet Rivers and in the passes of the Shasty Mountains. The show of a small force would, I am sure, have a good tendency in preventing their depredations on the whites who pass through the country, their hostility to whom, in a great measure, is to be ascribed to the conduct of the whites themselves, who leave no opportunity unimproved of molesting them. Cases have frequently occurred of white men shooting a poor, defenseless Indian without any provocation whatever.

A friendly disposition, with sufficient force to prevent any attack, could not fail to bring about the desired disposition on their parts.

The country they inhabit is a very rich one and would afford all the necessaries as well as the comforts of life.

A steamer having a light draft of water, a small fort on Lake Disappointment, and a few guns on Point Adams to defend the south channel with its dangerous bar, would be all sufficient for the defense of Columbia River.

Some points within the Strait of Juan de Fuca, Admiralty Inlet, or Puget Sound might be settled, where supplies, and so forth, could be had and depots established.

Two Government steamers would be able to protect our trade and territory and prevent disturbances among the northern tribes; they would be a more efficient force than stationary forts, and much more economical.

In case of difficulties, steamers would be enabled to reach any part of the coast from these points in two days.

In the event of hostilities in this country, the posts, so called, of the Hudson Bay Co. are not to be considered of strength against any force but Indians; they are mere stockades, and all their buildings, granaries, and so forth, are situated without the palisades.

They could offer but little resistence to any kind of armed force and their supplies could readily be cut off, both by sea and land.

The occupation of the north of the Columbia River, together with some point in the Strait of Juan de Fuca or the waters and sounds leading from it, I view as highly necessary in any event, and there is no force so well adapted for the security of this territory as that of steamers.

The waters of Puget Sound might be effectually defended from a naval force by occupying the narrows leading to it through which vessels must enter; at all times a dangerous narrow path, with strong current, no anchorage, and the winds almost always variable. I refer you to the charts which show this point distinctly.

Much has been said of the effective force of the Hudson Bay Co.; this, in my opinion, is an entire mistake and exaggeration of it.

It is true that the servants of the company are bound to bear arms during their term of servitude, but they are without any sort of discipline, few in number, generally of the class of farmers, worn-out Canadians, some few Iroquois Indians, and other tribes from the Canadas, and illy adapted to bear arms; about 100 at all the posts could be raised.

With regard to the natives, they are so distributed in small tribes that I am confident they would only be looked to as scouts and messengers, and those of the northern tribe would be too unruly to meddle with.

I am decidedly of opinion that the company would do everything to avoid the territory becoming a scene of war, particularly its officers.

They are now for the most part bound up with its peaceful occupation, being largely engaged in agriculture and grazing, which must all in a measure be sacrificed. And there would also be great difficulty, if not a total interruption, in their carrying on their fur trade.

It is not very probable that they would make any very strenuous endeavors to retain their interests under the British authority, as they well know that they may come in for the preservation of their property under the preemption right by transferring it to citizens of the United States, some of whom are well known to be interested and active partners in the business.

There are four passes through the Rocky Mountains. The one known as McGillivarys Pass, by the Committee's Punch Bowl is very difficult, and can only be used during the summer months, at which time the parties of the Hudson Bay Co. pursue this route.

Proceeding south we come to the great depth through which Lewis and Clarke found their way; and, finally, the two southern routes, which are preferable, susceptible of being used at almost all seasons, and a good wagon road may be constructed with little expense.

This leads to the first post of the Hudson Bay Co., viz, Fort Hall, established by Capt. Weyth, and has since been transferred to the company, so that it is readily to be perceived that the difficulties of communication with the territory is far less for us than the British.

I can not close this report without doing justice to the officers of the Hudson Bay Co.'s service for their kind and gentlemanly treatment to us whilst in the territory, and to bear testimony that during all my intercourse with them they seemed to be guided by one rule of conduct, highly creditable to them not only as men of business but to their feelings as gentlemen.

They afforded us every assistance that lay in their power, both in supplies and means of accomplishing our duties.

There are many persons in the country who bear testimony to the aid and kindness rendered to them in their outset, and of their hospitality it is needless to speak, for it has become proverbial.

To conclude, few portions of the globe, in my opinion, are to be found so rich in soil, diversified in surface, or capable of being rendered the happy abode of an industrious and civilized community.

For beauty of scenery and salubrity of climate it is not surpassed. It is peculiarly adapted for an agricultural and pastoral people, and no portion of the world beyond the Tropics is to be found that will yield so readily to the wants of man with moderate labor.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES WILKES,
Commanding Exploring Expedition.

REAR ADMIRAL CHARLES WILKES, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Born in New York City, 1801; died, 1877; entered the Navy January 1, 1818, and served through various grades. In 1829 he was ordered to prepare for explorations, and was later placed in charge of the chart depot at Washington, D. C., where he set up the first fixed astronomical instruments used in the United States, and was himself the first in this country to observe with them. Wilkes was selected to command the exploring expedition of 1838–1842 by reason of his energy and his scientific attainments. The expedition located many islands of the Pacific, the shores of the Antarctic Continent, determined the position of the south magnetic pole, added greatly to our knowledge of terrestrial magnetism, meteorology, hydrography and geography, and various sciences. In addition to his naval officers there were with him a corps of civilian scientists, consisting of Horatio Hale, philologist; J. P. Couthouy, conchologist; Charles Pickering and T. R. Peale, naturalists; J. D. Dana, geologist; William Rich, botanist; J. D. Brackenridge, horticulturist.

Wilkes sailed from Norfolk August 18, 1838, with the squadron composed of the Vincennes, Peacock, Porpoise, Sea Gull, Flying Fish, and Relief. After crossing the Atlantic to Madeira and recrossing to Rio de Janeiro he reached the Strait of Magellan in February, 1839, and surveyed to the southward to 70° S. The Sea Gull was lost and the Relief was ordered home by way of the Hawaiian Islands, to leave stores at Sydney and to make geographical explorations on the way. This expedition entered an almost unknown field, covering 10,000,000 square miles, a fifth of the earth's surface. In three years Wilkes's command visited and described the Tuamoto Archipelago, Society Islands, Samoan, Sandwich, Friendly, Ellice, Mulgrave, Gilbert, and Philippine Islands; Columbia River, Puget Sound, New Zealand, and Australia; charted more than 500 islands and harbors and gave sailing directions for them. So well was this work done that the charts of a large part of the islands of the Pacific are prepared to-day from his surveys. Magnetic observations were made at 57 stations. At important points latitude and longitude were determined by observations.

Passing from the Samoan Islands, Wilkes left Sydney December 26, 1839, and sailed south with the Vincennes, Peacock, and Porpoise. On January 16 he met with land at 64° S., 158° E., and skirted the shores of a new continent to 97° E. He reported:

It affords me much gratification to report that we have discovered a large body of land within the Antarctic Circle, which I have named the Antarctic Continent, and refer you to the report of our cruise and accompanying charts inclosed herewith for full information relative thereto.

By the summer of 1841 Wilkes again had worked his way through the Pacific and through the waters which now separate British Columbia from Washington to San Francisco, Cal., and thence crossed to the Philippines via the Hawaiian Islands, little thinking that he was traversing the route which was to become within the lifetime of his children the great highway between the holdings of his country in the Pacific. From Manila he turned homeward, sailed through the Indian and Atlantic Oceans, bearing not only the greatest single contribution that America ever made to geography, but also researches out of which grew Chronological History of Plants, Races of Men, Comparative Grammar of the Polynesian Dialects, and splendid volumes on geology, botany, ethnology, and philology, which have laid the foundation for all subsequent researches concerning the languages and migrations of the Polynesians and the peopling of the islands of the Pacific Ocean. Wilkes arrived at New York in June, 1842, after which his principal work was the preparation of his volumes for publication.

During the Civil War, on November 8, 1861, while in command of the U. S. S. San Jacinto, Wilkes took J. M. Mason and John Slidell, Confederate commissioners to England, from the English mail steamer Trent, for which he received the commendation of his Government, although the commissioners were later released. Wilkes commanded the James River Flotilla in 1862, the West India Squadron in 1863, and was retired on account of age in 1864. He died a rear admiral in Washington, D. C., in 1877.

Wilkes received the gold medal of the Geographical Society of London. He is the author of several works, among them Western America, including California and Oregon, and Theory of the Winds.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
LIBRARY AND NAVAL WAR RECORDS,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1911.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In regard to the reason that Wilkes's detailed report on the areas near the northwest boundary was not furnished to Congress on demand, it seems probable that the real reason may be found in the fact that at that time its publication or any public comment upon it would have been incompatible with our national interests.

In the various negotiations which took place between the United States and Great Britain for the settlement of the Oregon boundary, the United States proposed the forty-ninth parallel as a compromise to the conflicting claims west of the Rocky Mountains between 42° north and 54° 40′ north. For a long period the British Government asserted claim to all territory west of the Columbia River, and this claim was adhered to until a short time before the conclusion of the treaty in 1846.

Wilkes, in his report, gave American names to places and islands which were in the territory claimed by Great Britain, and this fact alone might have led to serious protest on the part of Great Britain.

The armed forces of the two nations concerned were drawn up within sight of each other in the fifties, but fortunately did not come to battle. The Civil War ended negotiations for a time, and later the present boundary was settled definitely.

Faithfully, yours,

CHARLES W. STEWART,
Superintendent Library and Naval War Records.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL WEDNESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that motion is not debatable. I was about to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I do not want to do that. I ask unanimous consent to proceed very briefly to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. KENDALL. Two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. KENDALL. The only purpose I have, Mr. Speaker, in suggesting the absence of a quorum is that the House may be in session on Monday for the transaction of business that I believe it ought to dispose of at this session of Congress. We have been assembling here on Saturday and adjourning until the following Wednesday, convening again on Wednesday and adjourning until the following Saturday, without the transaction of any business except such incidental matters as may by the grace of unanimous consent be considered in the House. We have a calendar here on motions to discharge, embracing about 70 bills, each one relating to a subject of some importance to the people of this country. I am going to refer to one of them. It is a bill (H. R. 4416) introduced by me on April 12, 1911, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. No report having been made, the motion to discharge that committee is now on file. The bill provides for pensions for volunteer soldiers of the Civil War who served 90 days or more and were honorably discharged. It allows a pension of $15 a month at 60 years of age, $20 a month at 65 years of age, $25 a month at 70 years of age, and $30 a month at 75 years of age. It is a bill almost identical with one which passed this House at the last Congress by almost a two-thirds vote. I believe it is a bill that has practically the unanimous indorsement of the people of this country. That bill is on the calendar and it must be considered by this House. It is strikingly similar to the Sulloway bill, which was favorably considered here last February, but which expired with the old Congress because of opposition which it encountered in the Senate. Now, what ought we to do here in these days and weeks that we are idling away, with nothing to engage our attention? That bill must be acted upon by this House, because the just public sentiment of the country will command some disposition of it.

Why can not we take that bill up here next Monday, consider it, pass it, and transfer it to the Senate, together with the responsibility for its future disposition, in the ordinary way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENDALL. I will; certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did not the President request that no legislation be enacted here except the reciprocity bill?

Mr. KENDALL. I am frank to say that perhaps some gentlemen on the other side of the House may enjoy more fully the confidence of the President than I do. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But I have understood that the reason for refusing the consideration of this pension bill was because the Democratic caucus resolved that no legislation of that character should be discussed at this session of Congress. However, even conceding what the gentleman from New York suggests—conceding that the President has said that no legislation ought to be considered except the reciprocity bill—I want to submit the query: Has that side of the House observed faithfully the suggestions of the Chief Magistrate? [Applause on the Republican side.] And whether that may or may not be true, have we become so subservient to extraneous influence that we have lost our independence and our initiative with respect to legislation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KENDALL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is very anxious to have some pension legislation enacted?

Mr. KENDALL. I have expressed a deep anxiety in that direction. To that extent I think the gentleman has interpreted my attitude correctly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's anxiety now is not very well taken, because if it were, why did not the gentleman show some anxiety in the last 16 years, during the time when his party was in control?

Mr. KENDALL. My anxiety was just as earnest in the last House, when the Republicans were in control, as it is at this moment. We passed the bill then. I ask the gentleman, Will you now, while your party controls the House, take similar action?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We on this side are not required to follow the action of that side of the House. Why did you not have the Republican Senate act when the House passed the bill before?

Mr. KENDALL. The responsibility is now with your side of the House, and it denies any relief whatever to the old veterans of the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Iowa is not responsible for what this side of the House does or omits to do.

Mr. KENDALL. No; God be thanked for that. We were advised at the last session by eloquent speeches made by prominent gentlemen on that side of the House of the solicitude experienced by the Democratic Party for the disabled soldiers of the Civil War. Some of those gentlemen have voted consistently all through this session to defer indefinitely any consideration of such legislation as this, so far as the House is concerned. We of the Republican minority want action on this subject now, and we charge on the Democratic majority here that by refusing to consider pension bills of this character on the first and third Mondays of each month, as the rules of the House provide, it is throttling all legislation for the benefit of the defenders of the Union. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman stating his case from his viewpoint, but I wish to consume a few minutes in stating why I think it is worth while to adjourn over until Wednesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Only a few moments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that we adopted a program at the beginning of this session to limit the legislation at this session largely to tariff legislation, in order to expedite the business of this extra session. The President of the United States requested that we should do so. The President of the gentleman's party did that. It is nothing unusual.

Mr. KENDALL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the President of the United States, being a Republican, requested certain action of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, he announced that in the papers—that he desired no action should be taken except as to reciprocity, and the papers published it at the time.

Mr. KENDALL. Was it not understood that the President desired that action be confined entirely to reciprocity?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. Why did you adopt his suggestion as to pension legislation and refuse to adopt it as to other things?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We did not refuse to adopt it as to pension legislation. It is just the other way.

I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that I understand that the Democratic Members on the Pension Committee have agreed on a pension bill, which they intend to report to this House when the proper time comes. They object to the bill that you have got on the calendar and from the consideration of which you want to discharge the committee before the committee has had a chance to bring its report into this House, because your bill taxes the American people in order to pension deserters who have had the charge of desertion removed by this House; to pension men who never were within 500 miles of a firing line; men who did not serve over 30 days in the Army.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. I am sure the gentleman from Alabama does not intend to misrepresent the provisions of the act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my understanding.

Mr. KENDALL. That demonstrates that the gentleman has not read the terms of the bill. The bill provides that every honorably discharged soldier or sailor, I think it is, who served 90 days, shall receive the benefit of this legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; it says 90 days, instead of 30 days.

Mr. KENDALL. But of course I agree, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill should be enacted the money necessary to pay the disbursements must come from some source of taxation. If the gentleman has discovered some plan by which pensions can be paid otherwise, I would be very glad to have him elucidate that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to doing that. The gentleman will find that in my remarks.

Mr. KENDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended if this takes too much of the gentleman's time. Is it proposed that taxation shall be extended to meet the disbursements under this imaginary bill of yours?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman, that——

Mr. KENDALL. Does not your bill—this imaginary bill of yours—propose to tax the people?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course it does; but you propose to pass through this House, without a report from a committee, without due consideration by a committee, by discharging the committee on the floor of the House, a bill that will pension a man who served 90 days, who was never within 500 miles of the firing line, who was never injured in any way. Some of them served after the war was practically over. You make no discrimination between the real veteran and the man who never went on the firing line.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The motion that is on the calendar, to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill, will, if agreed to, merely bring the bill before the House for consideration, amendment, or any disposition that a majority of the House may seek to make of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am surprised that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois should contend before this House, after his many, many years of experience, that a great bill, carrying $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 of appropriations, should be brought before this House, right or wrong, and then perfected in the House instead of in a committee, when I have seen him stand on this floor for more than 15 years and contend that legislation should be perfected in the committees before being reported to this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 or 10 minutes if he desires it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman that the one-man power, the power of a minority, the power of a czar, has been worn and worn in the press and by the gentleman's side when it was in the minority, until they say czarism has been abolished and that the representatives of the people have the intelligence and the patriotism and the power to mature legislation, and you believe in the rule of a majority. I want to say to the gentlemen now in the minority that I believe a majority of this House is perfectly competent to amend any pension bill intelligently. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the gentleman from Illinois has at last been converted to the doctrine that has been preached on this side of the House—that the will of the majority should govern. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am not objecting to the gentleman from Illinois becoming a Republican progressive. [Laughter.] I am not objecting to his joining the movement with this side of the House; but what I do say is that our system on this side of the House is to have all legislation first perfected by a committee and then submitted without gag rule, without unreasonable limitation on debate, and with a full and free latitude of amendment, to a majority of this House to pass upon; but that the committee should have the opportunity to report the bill it desires to bring before the House first, and then the House be given full opportunity to consider it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if the committee has not had ample time to report this particular bill, or any other?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. The very object of the rule, and the very object of the Motion to Discharge, is to bring these matters before the House when the committee has failed to act or has not acted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. NORRIS. They have had ample time to act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. We do not deny that. We have taken the responsibility on this side of the House, by a resolution passed in our caucus, that we would not legislate on anything but a certain number of questions, the election of the United States Senators by the people, publicity of campaign funds, statehood, and tariff legislation. Now, we have taken that responsibility, and we are going to legislate on this other subject when we get to it next winter, but we have refused to do it this summer. We are not dodging our responsibility. I was about to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] that he does not place the responsibility any more on us by forcing this House to come here Monday and adjourn, because it will not have a quorum, than we acknowledge we have to-day. We do not deny our responsibility.

Mr. KENDALL. I understood the gentleman tried to shift the responsibility to the President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; I did not. I said that the President of the United States——

Mr. KENDALL. I withdraw that suggestion. That really relates to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one minute. I want to say this to that side of the House. Of course, if you want to come back here on Monday and adjourn on Monday, very well; we can do it. There are a lot of Members who want to be away. If the gentleman wants to know it, we do not deny our responsibility for not acting on this bill.

Mr. KENDALL. If the gentleman from Alabama will say that he, as the responsible leader of the Democratic majority, will adjourn the House on Monday without allowing us to take any action on this bill, then I will not insist at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly I will, because I will have to on the very first roll call. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under this rule for the discharge of committees, in order for the House to take it up, you would have to have a roll call. It would not be on the pension bill, because that is not the first bill on the calendar, but the moment you got your roll call it would disclose that there is not a quorum in Washington, and there would be nothing on earth left for me to do but to move that the House adjourn. That is the condition. If you desire to make the point of no quorum on this vote, why, of course, we must adjourn the House and come back and then adjourn on Monday, as I say I will do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in response to what the gentleman has said.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENDALL. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, the leader of the Democratic majority of the House, that even if the House should be in session on next Monday he would not permit any pension legislation to be considered, I think I would not be justified in insisting upon the absence of a quorum this afternoon. Also, in further view of what the gentleman has said with reference to the character of the bill which I desire should be considered on that day, I ask unanimous consent that I may include that bill in the RECORD.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill granting pensions to honorably discharged volunteer soldiers who served three months or more between the 1st day of April, 1861, and the 1st day of August, 1865, in the Army of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act every volunteer soldier who served three months or more in the Army of the United States between the 1st day of April, 1861, and the 1st day of August, 1865, and who has been honorably discharged from said Army, shall be entitled, upon establishing such facts in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to a pension of $15 per month if 60 years of age, $20 per month if 65 years of age, $25 per month if 70 years of age, and $30 per month if 75 years of age: Provided, That no person shall receive a pension under any other law at the same time or for the same period that he is receiving a pension under the provisions of this act: And provided further, That no person who is now receiving or shall hereafter receive a greater pension under any other general or special law than he would be entitled to receive under the provisions herein shall be pensionable under this act.

SEC. 2. That no pension attorney, claim agent, or other person shall be entitled to receive any compensation for services rendered in presenting any claim to the Bureau of Pensions or securing any pension under this act.

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent—

Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of death in family.

Mr. LEVER was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read a communication to the Speaker of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
The Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby respectfully resign as a member of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and ask that my resignation be accepted.

Respectfully, THERON E. CATLIN.

JULY 12, 1911.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Missouri will be excused from further service on the committee named in the letter.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Wednesday, July 19, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 17, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against any further investigation being made into the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as a Senator from Illinois, which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a petition of the New York Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of the committee on peace propaganda and international relations of the National German-American Alliance of the United States, praying for the ratification of a treaty of arbitration between the United States and Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERN presented resolutions adopted by Group 3, Indiana Bankers' Association, indorsing the plan for monetary legislation as suggested by the National Monetary Commission, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Polish Turners' Union No. 1, of South Bend, Ind., favoring the adoption of the so-called Sulzer resolution providing for an investigation into the present conditions existing at Ellis Island, and also for a revision of the immigration laws, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BRISTOW presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Arkansas City, Lewis, Jasper, and Wichita, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday rest bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Fort Scott, Kans., remonstrating against the establishment of a rural parcels-post service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the Gaelic Athletic Club, of Hartford, Conn., and a memorial of the United Irish League of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented memorials of sundry citizens of Whitney, Chadron, Crawford, Lisco, and Oshkosh, all in the State of Nebraska, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventists Church of Viola, Idaho, and a memorial of sundry citizens of Forest, Idaho, remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STEPHENSON. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 149, A.) memorializing Congress of the United States to take such action as may be necessary to compel all interstate railroads to engage directly in the business of carrying and delivering express.

Whereas the present system of carrying on the express business of this country by companies which enter into private contract with railroads for the transportation of goods is an economic waste, in that such system requires and necessitates to a considerable extent duplicate equipment and investment, and earnings necessary to insure a reasonable return on such duplicate investment; and

Whereas it is one of the paramount functions of both Nation and State to enact laws which will compel all businesses affected with a public interest to be so conducted as to afford to the people the best possible service at the lowest possible rate; and

Whereas to compel railroads to engage in the business of carrying and delivering express will obviate the necessity for duplicate investment and duplicate profit now existing; and

Whereas other countries, with success both economically and financially, have combined the railroad and express business: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully request the Congress of the United States to take such action as may be necessary to compel all interstate railroads to engage directly in the business of carrying and delivering express; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Chief Clerks of the two Houses of Congress and to the United States Senators and Congressmen from Wisconsin.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
H. C. MARTIN,
Acting President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENSON. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 135, A.) memorializing Congress to initiate or participate in a general world-wide movement through The Hague Tribunal, or otherwise, for international peace and general disarmament and the international policing of the high seas.

Whereas during the last two-year period, in a time of profound peace, our Federal Government expended for military and naval purposes over $555,000,000.

Wisconsin's share of this enormous expenditure, on the basis of population, exceeds $14,000,000, and by reason of the high economic, industrial, and social development of this State its contribution undoubtedly far exceeds the above amount.

The total amount of taxes levied directly by this State during the two-year period was less than $2,000,000, and the total of income and of disbursements of this State for all general purposes was less than $13,000,000.

The people of Wisconsin therefore pay for the military and naval expenditures of the Federal Government more than seven times the amount paid in taxes to the State and a sum far in excess of the receipts or of the disbursements of the State.

This enormous expenditure for war purposes does not include any part of the expenditure during the same period of over $322,000,000 for pensions and over $43,000,000 for interest on indebtedness incurred in time of war.

Whereas the progress of civilization and of science has relegated war as a settlement of international disputes to a thing of the past, and the growing control of the Government by the people who must bear its burdens has practically rendered future war impossible, and the present military and naval expenditures constitute wholly an economic loss, which expenditure, in view of our scientific progress, is not even justified for war purposes, benefiting only the great trusts and combinations which fatten on contracts for construction and supplies, robbing the great body of the people of the higher economic plane which is justly theirs.

Whereas any movement for peace, to insure success, must be placed upon a broad basis, and recent attempts to place the burden or responsibility of this movement upon the people of any race or language must fail.

Civilization is not confined to English-speaking people, and the population of our country and of our State has come largely from other than English-speaking countries, making signal contribution to the cause of peace.

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to initiate or participate in a general world-wide movement through The Hague Tribunal, or otherwise, for the establishment of international peace and for a general disarmament by all nations and the international patroling of the high seas and of territory exposed to or inhabited by savage tribes.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
H. C. MARTIN,
Acting President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENSON. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 65, S.) memorializing Congress to enact a law imposing a suitable license or other fee upon crafts navigating the Great Lakes and contiguous waters.

Whereas it is impracticable for the several States bordering upon the Great Lakes and contiguous waters to levy and collect taxes upon the vessels and crafts navigating thereon because of the inability of the several States to enact uniform laws respecting the taxation of such crafts and vessels; and

Whereas the great majority of such vessels and crafts practically escape taxation by any jurisdiction; and

Whereas it has thus far been the policy of the Federal Government to leave the inner harbor improvements to the several States or local political units: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to enact a law or laws regulating commerce on the Great Lakes and contiguous waters and imposing a suitable license, registration, or other fee on vessels and other crafts engaged in commerce on said waters, the same being commonly designated by the Federal Government as the northwestern waters, together with all contiguous lakes, rivers, sounds, and bayous, and that the Federal Government improve the inner harbors of the several ports of entry on said waters with the proceeds of said fees; be it further

Resolved, That the governor be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives at Washington and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress for this State.

H. C. MARTIN,
Acting President of the Senate.
C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. STEPHENSON. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 30, A.) memorializing Congress in regard to the establishment of a parcels post.

Whereas parcels post, where established in foreign countries, has proven to be promotive of the best interests of the people, and at the same time financially advantageous to the country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully memorialize Congress to enact such a law as will remedy the evils of the present system of mail classification and mail carrying, and which shall provide for the ownership by the Federal Government of its own mail cars for the carrying of mail and express, and that compensation to the railroads therefor be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the basis of mileage for hauling of such mail and express cars instead of upon the basis of weight of the mails, and providing for the carrying of mail and express thereby under a complete parcels-post system; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, the Postmaster General, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from this State.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
ISAAC T. BISHOP,
Acting President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENSON. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 76, S.) relating to the ownership and operation of railroads, docks, and steamship lines necessary for the opening up of the Alaskan Territory and the coastwise trade.

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Members of the House of Representatives and the United States Senators from Wisconsin are requested to introduce such measures and to take such action as shall bring about the construction, ownership, and operation of the railroads, docks, and steamship lines by the United States, necessary to the opening up of the Alaskan coal fields and other natural resources in the Territory of Alaska: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state to each Member of the House of Representatives and each United States Senator from Wisconsin.

THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. ROOT presented resolutions adopted by the New York Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, favoring the adoption of the proposed treaties of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain and the United States and France, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHIVELY presented resolutions adopted by Group 3, Indiana Bankers' Association, at Marion Ind., July 3, 1911, favoring the plan for monetary legislation as suggested by the American Bankers' Association, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present a communication from the Ancient Order of Gleaners, which is one of the most important agricultural organizations in the State of Michigan. I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the communication was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

ANCIENT ORDER OF GLEANERS,
SUPREME ARBOR,
Detroit Mich., June 30, 1911.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You will, I am sure, pardon me for writing you again with reference to the ratification of the so-called reciprocity treaty with Canada.

As the time approaches for a vote in the Senate on this very important measure, interest among the farmers has grown to fever heat, and a flood of letters reaches my office every day, asking if it is not possible to do something more to prevent the ratification of this treaty; if in some way the attention of the Senate can not be called to the far-reaching effects of the proposed legislation; if the farmers' side of the question can not in some manner be presented so that their interests may be seriously considered. The past few days have brought so many requests that I can not refrain from writing you, and I do so, not with the hope of suggesting anything new, but to conscientiously present, so far as I am able, the attitude of the farmers on this very important question.

You will remember, Senator SMITH, that the organized farmers of this State sent a special messenger to Washington during the closing hours of the last Congress, bearing petitions signed by more than 40,000 farmers, asking that the reciprocity agreement be not ratified. You will be interested to know that these signatures were secured within 48 hours by farmers who went among their neighbors, through snow banks and over almost impassable roads, explaining the treaty and securing the signatures of their brother farmers.

From that day to this interest in the proposed treaty has increased, and as the farmer has studied its provisions he has become convinced that the treaty in its present form is unfair to the agriculturist; that its adoption will disturb existing satisfactory conditions, readjust farm values, and place the farmer in a position where he must of necessity be prepared to accept the result, whatever it may be, and calmly await the final adjusting of the balances before he can reach out and again lay hold of something tangible.

You have heard from several different interests in Michigan, and it has been stated that the farmers who have signed the petitions to be presented to the Senate and written thousands of letters to their Representatives have not read the bill and therefore do not understand its provisions.

You are sufficiently familiar with the cost of producing crops in the State of Michigan to know that for 13 of the 18 years referred to in the accompanying schedule the farmers of Michigan and adjoining States could not, through any plan save soil robbery, make a living, to say nothing of striving to make a profit. You will find that during the past 18 years the farmers of Michigan have seen but 5 profitable years. Is it possible the people's representatives have forgotten that within the period mentioned the farmers of Iowa and Illinois burned their corn for fuel, finding this course more profitable than to sell it at the market price and buy coal?

Will you please consider the following schedule, which will give you the actual prices paid to the farmers, at a point 98 miles from the city of Detroit, on six commodities, during the past 18 years:

Years.	Wheat.	Oats.	Pork, dressed.	Poultry.	Butter.	Eggs.
1894	$0.51½	$0.30⅜	$6.06	$0.05½	$0.15	$0.12½
1895	.60	.27	5.10	.05⅜	.13	.13⅜
1896	.66½	.18	4.27	.05½	.10½	.11½
1897	.82½	.18⅜	3.83	.05	.11	.10
1898	.77	.26½	4.04½	.04⅜	.13	.11
1899	.65½	.25½	4.36¼	.05⅜	.14½	.13⅜
1900	.66½	.24¼	5.77	.05½	.16	.13
1901	.69½	.35½	6.52	.05½	.14¼	.13½
1902	.74½	.37⅜	7.60½	.06¼	.16⅜	.16⅜
1903	.72½	.34½	7.27½	.07	.16½	.15⅜
1904	.99½	.35⅜	5.56⅜	.06½	.15⅜	.17½
1905	.92	.30⅜	5.65½	.06⅜	.17½	.17
1906	.74½	.31¾	7.45	.07¼	.17⅜	.16⅜
1907	.81½	.42	7.56	.07½	.20½	.17½
1908	.90½	.49	6.54⅜	.07½	.19½	.17½
1909	1.13	.46½	8.56½	.09	.21⅜	.21½
1910	1.15	.42⅜	10.87½	.11⅜	.22½	.21
1911	.84	.31	7.50	.09	.15	.15

The prices quoted are the actual prices paid by the local dealers, and represent in each instance the whole amount received by the farmer for the different commodities.

You will note that during the last five years the farmer made a profit, and that profit went into needed improvements about the farm; better buildings, better farm implements, and some of the home comforts and conveniences. Men returned to the farms, and the problem of the high cost of living was soon solved.

During these five years of prosperity on the farms the wealth found its way to the cities. Thousands of people in the city of Detroit and in every other city of Michigan and hundreds living in the little villages are riding in their gasoline cars, which are more luxurious than the golden chariots of the kings of old.

The wives and families of hundreds of thousands of workingmen in the cities enjoy luxuries that the farmer could not, and even now can not, afford.

All of these people are beneficiaries of the prosperity which springs from the soil at the bidding of the 9,000,000 men and women of the farms who have worked on and on uncomplainingly, aiding in building the magnificent industries of this country, protecting the manufacturers against the so-called unfair foreign competition, and the men who labored from the pauper labor of the Old World.

Did it ever occur to you that the city laboring man actually spends less than one-sixth of his wage for the foodstuffs which come from the farm?

And did you know that of the workingman's dollar less than 40 cents goes to the farmer?

Such, my dear Senator, is the case, and you can verify the statement by a half hour's visit to the workingman's home in any city and a journey of 5 miles into the adjoining country, where you can learn just what the farmer receives and what the workingman has to pay for the products of the farm.

No less an authority than James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, said in his last report:

"From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between farmer and consumer the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the prices that he pays.

"After consideration of the elements of the matter it is plain that the farmer is not getting an exorbitant price for his products and that the cost of distribution from the time of delivery at destination by the railroad to delivery to the consumer is the feature of the problem of high prices which must present itself to the consumer for treatment."

And yet this same gentleman now has not a word of encouragement for the farmer; no suggestion as to how the problem may be solved. He simply favors opening American markets to Canada and letting the farmer care for himself and his problems.

I will admit that for a brief period during 1909 and 1910 prices reached a higher level, and the wise ones said that now consumption had reached the normal production in the United States; that no more new land was available, and that we should never see low prices on farm produce again. But the industrious farmers, encouraged by better prices, soon solved the problem, and the prices quoted on the markets of the United States to-day for all farm commodities have knocked the theory of the "theorists" into smithereens.

But it is now proposed, through the Canadian treaty, to invite the farmers of Canada to participate in the benefits of the American market. Thus the farmers of the United States are expected to cooperate with the farmers of a foreign country, with farmers whose interests are not identical with those of the farmers of the United States, with the people of a foreign nation who have sworn allegiance to a foreign government. I tell you, Mr. SMITH, those who are expecting a solution of the problem through such channels are going to be disappointed, because such cooperation is absolutely impossible.

A hundred million dollars' worth of farm produce was shipped from the Dominion of Canada last year to England; $9,000,000 worth to the United States.

If the treaty is ratified, the $100,000,000 worth of produce comes this way if we have as good a market, carrying charges, of course, considered.

A country larger than the United States, with its 9,000,000 people and room on its tillable land for millions more, will be invited to participate in the American markets, and as the years increase the increased production will be equally welcome.

Yet should the American farmer journey over to Windsor, Ontario, and there dispose of his load of produce and desire to take the money received from his Canadian neighbor and purchase needed farm implements or clothing for his family, he would be halted by the customs officers of his own State and made to pay from 20 to 45 per cent duty on his purchases. And yet some choose to call this "reciprocity."

We have been an extravagant people; the forests have been plundered and the soil robbed. It costs money and time and toil to replace what nature gave us with a lavish hand. It costs more to produce a given crop than it did two decades ago; fertilizer must be used; crops must be rotated. Let's not talk about the farmers of the United States not being able to supply the demand for products of the farm so long as we are among the third-rate nations, so far as production per acre is concerned.

Shall we open up another vast territory of virgin soil by opening the gates and sending a million farmers of the United States across the border to usher in another era of rented farms and the attendant evils in the United States?

Or shall we give the farmers a chance, by making farm life attractive, through making farming profitable? You will not need a country-life commission; you will not need additional legislation in the farmer's behalf. Just give him a square deal and a fair chance; that is all he asks.

If the Senate could but adjourn for a week and each Senator visit his home State and note the unsettled conditions as they exist to-day, the uncertainty of farm values, the unstable markets; if they could only realize that the agitation of this reciprocity agreement has already cost the farmers of the United States millions of dollars, they would return to Washington satisfied with present conditions and willing to wait until a real demand existed for a reciprocal agreement with Canada.

The Canadian Government is encouraging agriculture by furnishing the farmer financial assistance, not by putting unsurmountable barriers in its way. Does the United States stand ready to loan money to buy elevators, that the farmer may be able to elude the greedy elevator combine? Will our Government loan money to the farmer in order that he may develop his farm and add to its productiveness? These questions must be considered, my dear Senator, lest the charge stand that a Judas has betrayed the farmers' interests and placed the advantage in the hands of the loyal subjects of King George.

They will tell you, Senator, that farmers are in favor of this treaty. I have attended meetings in four States; I have met thousands of "real" farmers, and heard from thousands more, and I have not found a single man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow who favors this pact.

In conclusion, I have only to say that the farmers have done all they could do under existing conditions. Practically unorganized, they have rallied and presented their petitions and prayed for a hearing as never before. Yet it seems that they have been crying as one in a wilderness.

And still, believing that right will finally triumph, I feel that they will be heard; that their petitions will not go unanswered; that strong men who believe in a square deal for the whole people will arise in the Senate and demand for the men and women of the farms of this country every privilege granted to the men and women of every other calling.

Sincerely, yours, GRANT SLOCUM,
Supreme Secretary Ancient Order of Gleaners.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF LAW.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12312) to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 103) thereon.

BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KERN:

A bill (S. 3036) granting a pension to Lewis C. Jones (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3037) granting an increase of pension to Spencer N. Preston (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 3038) granting an increase of pension to David L. Gaines (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HEYBURN:

A bill (S. 3039) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Fields (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 3040) granting an increase of pension to Susan Berfield (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Maine:

A bill (S. 3041) for the relief of Michael Burns; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 3042) granting an increase of pension to Francis Fisher;

A bill (S. 3043) granting an increase of pension to Henry M. Endsley (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3044) granting an increase of pension to Daniel W. Roan (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make certain payments to the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Cherokee, and Seminole Tribes of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

TEXAS STATE CLAIM (S. DOC. NO. 67).

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the deficiency appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed, and that it be printed in the RECORD without reading, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It is intended to discover what expenditures may have been made by the State of Texas to protect its frontier during certain years prior to the Civil War against Mexican and Indian marauders, with the view to reimburse the State.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CULBERSON to the bill (H. R. ——) to supply a deficiency in appropriations, and for other purposes.

Add the following paragraph:

"The Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire and report to Congress for its consideration what sum or sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period of time between January 1, 1856, and March 5, 1861, in payment of State volunteers or rangers called into service by authority of the governor of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, for which reimbursement has not heretofore been made out of the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. CULBERSON. In connection with the proposed amendment I ask to have printed as a Senate document certain papers which I have, consisting of a brief statement of the claim of Texas presented by the amendment, and a letter from the governor of Texas, with accompanying papers, which explain the claim in detail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order therefor will be entered, and the papers will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations to accompany the amendment.

AMENDMENT TO FARMERS' FREE-LIST BILL.

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents a communication from Hon. J. M. TERRELL, Senator from Georgia, transmitting a copy of a letter from him to the governor of Georgia resigning his seat in the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum before the letter is read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Borah	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Brandegee	Curtis	Myers	Stone
Briggs	Dixon	Nelson	Sutherland
Bristow	Foster	Oliver	Swanson
Brown	Gronna	Overman	Taylor
Bryan	Heyburn	Page	Townsend
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Watson
Burton	Kern	Perkins	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Pomerene	Williams
Chilton	Lodge	Root	Works
Clapp	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Crawford	McLean	Smith, S. C.

Mr. BURNHAM. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably absent for reasons well known to the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I desire this statement to stand without repetition.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] attending the Lorimer investigation. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day so far as all questions of a quorum are concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The Chair desires to lay before the Senate a communication, which he asks the Secretary to read in full. The Chair thinks that the letter also had better be read in full. Without objection, the Secretary will read, first, the letter, and then the other communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
July 14, 1911.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Vice President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith I hand you a copy of my letter of resignation, addressed to Gov. Smith, of Georgia, and which I have just sent him.

With best wishes, I am, yours, very truly,

J. M. TERRELL.

ATLANTA, GA., July 14, 1911.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Governor, Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR SIR: The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 3, paragraph 2, provides that "the executive thereof [the State] may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." My commission as United States Senator from Georgia appointed me "until the next meeting of the general assembly of this State."

So far as I am informed, this question has not been authoritatively determined by the United States Senate, although by sufferance or physical precedent a Senator so commissioned might retain his position for a limited time at the pleasure of his successor.

The Legislature of Georgia has elected my successor and chosen him to represent the sovereignty of the State in the United States Senate, thus filling such vacancy. There are pending before that body at this time measures of the greatest importance to the people, votes upon which will be demanded in the immediate future. Georgia should be represented by two Senators, supported by all of the power that the fullest confidence of the State can give. That expression of confidence having been given you by the general assembly, you are the only man whose vote on any matter now pending in the Senate can be said to have the official authority of the State back of it.

By the action of the general assembly you have been offered the commission to represent the State in my place. I can not, therefore, in justice to myself nor to the State whose credentials have been placed in your hands, undertake to assume a responsibility nor to wear an honor that belongs to you and which you specifically have been asked to take instead of me. Any other course on my part would be undignified and unworthy.

I believe that my term of office as United States Senator has expired under my commission, but in order to remove all possible doubt that may arise in the minds of anyone I respectfully resign the office of United States Senator from Georgia, to take effect this day.

Wishing you success and congratulating you upon the honor that has been conferred upon you, I am,

Very truly, yours, J. M. TERRELL.

[Telegram.]

ATLANTA, GA., July 17.

Hon. JAMES S. SHERMAN,
Vice President, Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

My successor as United States Senator elected by the Legislature of Georgia last Wednesday. It is my opinion that this election terminated my term of office, but to remove all doubt I sent my resignation last Friday afternoon to Gov. Smith and mailed you copy of same. This resignation is irrevocable and I have so notified Gov. Smith. I will be glad for you to instruct the Secretary to strike my name from the roll of Senators. Please wire me whether further action is necessary upon my part.

J. M. TERRELL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to say in this connection that, of course, the Chair would not assume the responsibility, without the action of the Senate, of directing the Secretary to strike any Senator's name from the roll. But the Chair assumes that the Senate will acquiesce in the resignation presented to the governor of Georgia by the Senator from Georgia, and the Chair assumes that the Senate would acquiesce in the Senator's desire to have his name stricken from the roll. Unless there be objection on the part of some Senator, the Chair will instruct the Secretary to strike Mr. TERRELL's name from the roll of the Senate. No objection is heard, and the Secretary will so act. The letter and accompanying papers will be placed on the files.

PURE-FOOD LAW—DEFINITION OF WHISKY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the following resolution of the Senate of June 7, 1911—

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all the documents and data, including the official opinions and regulations of the Department of Agriculture or bureau heads thereof and of the Department of Justice or officers thereof, together with all printed briefs, arguments, and reports of counsel representing the various interests connected therewith in the matter of the controversy generally known under the caption or question, "What is whisky," accompanying the same with the decision or decisions rendered by the President in relation thereto.

I transmit herewith the documents and data referred to, together with letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of Agriculture.

The Senate is requested to return the documents and data transmitted herewith for the files of the departments when they have served the purpose of the Senate.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 13, 1911.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the message and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Printing rather than have the Chair order it printed, as a large part of it has already been once printed. If there be no objection that order will be followed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Wednesday morning next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I will submit some remarks on the reciprocity bill. As the time for the discussion of that bill is limited, I think I should state to Senators who desire to speak on the subject that my remarks will be very brief, probably not exceeding half an hour in length.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed, and the calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as first in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men in the United States Navy or Marine Corps, and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I think desires to be here when that bill is taken up for consideration. I therefore ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is a bill to which I have offered an amendment. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who has taken considerable interest in the bill, is absent. Perhaps I ought to ask, therefore, to have the bill go over until he may be here or until we know whether he will be here this session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1899) to repeal a portion of an act heretofore passed relating to the alienation of the title of the United States to land in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected" was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not know who objected to that bill, but it seems to me——

Mr. HEYBURN. I objected to it.

Mr. LODGE. Then I move that the bill be taken up, notwithstanding the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bill be considered, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, if it is in order, I suggest that the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and other members of that committee are absent.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. BURTON. Several amendments have been presented to this bill which will lead to somewhat extended discussion, and when they are considered those members of the committee would probably desire to be present. If I thought the bill would go over for the session, I would interpose no possible question or objection, but I think it is safe to say that the bill will pass during this session.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to say that I am aware that the chairman of the committee is absent, but I have also been informed by members of the committee that it is his desire that the Senate should dispose of this bill. That was stated here when we came to our general agreement on the other matters. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is not here this morning, spoke about it at the time when that agreement was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. And I therefore have made the motion to proceed to consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. LODGE. I know that; and I am aware that I was out of order in discussing the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "five," to strike out "and," and in the same line, after the word "six," to insert the words "and eight," so as to read:

That sections 5, 6 and 8 of an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," approved June 25, 1910, be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "each," to strike out "third" and insert "sixth," so as to read:

SEC. 5. That the treasurer of every such political committee shall, not more than 15 days and not less than 10 days next before an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected in two or more States, file in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., with said Clerk, an itemized detailed statement; and on each sixth day thereafter until such election said treasurer shall file with said Clerk a supplemental itemized detailed statement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 3, to insert the following:

SEC. 8. That any person may in connection with such election incur and pay from his own private funds for the purpose of influencing or controlling, in two or more States, the results of an election at which Representatives to the Congress of the United States are elected, all necessary personal expenses for his traveling, for stationery, and postage, and for telegraph and telephone service without being subject to the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Is the bill open to further amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still open to amendment, but the committee amendments have not all been disposed of as yet.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before section 8 is passed I should like to inquire whether those personal expenses must be reported.

Do I understand that that provision in section 8 makes it unnecessary for the candidate or committee to report the amount of those personal expenses?

Mr. BORAH. It would seem from reading the section that those items which are covered by this section would not need to be reported at all.

The section says:

SEC. 8. That any person may in connection with such election incur and pay from his own private funds for the purpose of influencing or controlling, in two or more States, the results of an election at which Representatives to the Congress of the United States are elected, all necessary personal expenses for his traveling, for stationery, and postage, and for telegraph and telephone service without being subject to the provisions of this act.

That would necessarily mean, I suppose, that he would not have to report those at all, as they would not be subject to this act. I do not know what the understanding of the committee is, but the language seems to imply that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was, on page 4, after line 11, to insert as a new section, section 2, the following:

SEC. 2. That section 8, as above amended, and sections 9 and 10 of said act be renumbered as sections 9, 10, and 11, and that a new section be inserted after section 7 of the said original act, to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election, or for election at any general election, as Representative in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day for holding such primary election, and not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of the general election at which candidates for Representatives are to be nominated or elected, file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value disbursed or used by such candidate, or by his agents or representatives, so far as known or understood by such candidate to have been so disbursed or used, in any manner whatsoever, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such disbursements were made for the purpose of securing his nomination or election.

"Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election, or for indorsement at any general election, or election before the legislature of any State, as Senator in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of holding such primary election, and not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of the general election at which he is seeking indorsement, and not less than 5 nor more than 10 days before the day upon which the first vote is to be taken in the two houses of the legislature before which he is a candidate for election as Senator, file with the Secretary of the Senate at Washington, D. C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value disbursed or used by such candidate, or by his agents or representatives, so far as known or understood by such candidate to have been so disbursed or used, in any manner whatsoever, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such disbursements were made for the purpose of securing his nomination or election.

"Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election, for indorsement or election at any general election, or for election by the legislature of any State, shall, within 15 days after any such primary election, and within 15 days after any such general election, and within 15 days after the day upon which the legislature shall have elected a Senator, file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or with the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value disbursed or used by such candidate, or by his agents or representatives, so far as known or understood by such candidate to have been disbursed or used, in any manner whatsoever, up to, on, or after the day of such primary election, general election, or election by the legislature, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such disbursements were made for the purpose of securing his nomination, indorsement, or election.

"Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, directly or indirectly, or by anyone for him with his knowledge, before the completion of any such primary or general election, or election by the legislature, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, and if any such promise or pledge shall have been made, the name or names, the address or addresses, and the occupation or occupations, of the person or persons to whom such promise or pledge shall have been made, shall be stated, together with a description of the position relating to which such promise or pledge has been made. In the event that no such promise or pledge has been made by such candidate, that fact shall be distinctly stated.

"Every such statement hereinbefore referred to shall be verified by the oath of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the law of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative, or the State in which he is a candidate for Senator, in the Congress of the United States: Provided, That if at the time of such primary or general election or election by the State legislature said candidate shall be in attendance upon either House of Congress as a Member thereof he may at his election verify such statement before any officer authorized to administer oaths in the District of Columbia."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, on page 7, line 8, after the word "knowledge," I move to insert the words "or authority," so that it will read:

Or by anyone for him, with his knowledge or authority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "knowledge," insert "or authority."

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Utah yield for a suggestion?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I introduced an amendment to the effect that those words "or authority" should be inserted, but concluded on considering the subject somewhat more fully that that was hardly sufficient, and I suggest this phraseology:

Or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge.

Of course the object of it is obvious enough. A candidate for office at the beginning of a contest might say to some friend, "I will make no promises, but you may make promises, and I will stand by what you say," and the law might be evaded.

Will the Senator from Utah consent to that substitution which I ask?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah accept that in lieu of the amendment he has heretofore offered?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 8, after the word "knowledge," insert:

Or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is proceeding so fast that I have not got the import of the amendment. I wish the Senator from Ohio would explain what the amendment is.

Mr. BURTON. The object of this amendment is this—the Senator from Utah has the floor, if he will yield to me——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. The bill as reported requires every candidate to include in his sworn statement—a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, directly or indirectly, or by anyone for him with his knowledge, before the completion of any such primary or general election, or election by the legislature, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof.

The manifest aim is to destroy the corrupt influence of promises for appointment or recommendation to office. But it seemed to the Senator from Utah and to myself that the phraseology was hardly complete. First, it includes "a promise or pledge made by him directly or indirectly"; second, "or by anyone for him with his knowledge."

That second clause contemplates that another person might make the promise for the candidate, and he would confirm his action. But this promise might be made by another person without his knowledge, in pursuance of a general authority to act for him in matters of patronage.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will readily understand that at the beginning of a campaign a candidate for office might give power to make promises over to another person.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. And the promises made by that other person would be effective, although without the candidate's knowledge, and he could file this affidavit with the utmost good faith, and say "I have made no promises," when, in truth and in fact, he had brought to bear an influence on his behalf just as potent by allowing another person to promise for him.

Mr. REED. What is the Senator's amendment?

Mr. BURTON. "Or to whom he has given authority."

Mr. REED. It is a very good amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before we get too far away from this subject, I did not quite understand the inquiry which was made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. But I desire to put into the RECORD the statement that section 8, as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, strengthens the existing section 8 upon that subject.

Section 8 of the existing law provides:

SEC. 8. That any person may, in connection with such election, incur and pay from his own private funds for the purpose of influencing or controlling, in two or more States, the result of an election at which Representatives to the Congress of the United States are elected all personal expenses for his traveling and for purposes incidental to traveling, for stationery and postage, and for telegraph and telephone service without being subject to the provisions of this act.

It will be noted that in section 8 as reported by the committee, which intends to amend section 8 of the original act, the word "necessary" is written in before the words "personal expenses," so that it reads "all necessary personal expenses," and the limitation in the existing law "and for purposes incidental to traveling" are stricken out in the proposed amendment, so that it applies only to expenses for traveling and excludes purposes incidental to travel.

The committee thought that the law would be strengthened by the insertion to which I have called attention and also by the elimination to which I have called attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have the Senator's construction of the word "necessary." Of course, it is a question whether it is necessary to travel at all. To one who is before the people as a candidate the matter of necessity is a question of his own creation. He goes out to travel or to assist himself in obtaining votes, and the question is, How would you apply the word "necessary?"

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The word "necessary" qualifies "expenses" and not "traveling." The language is, the Senator will observe, "all necessary personal expenses for his traveling." The word "necessary" qualifies "expenses;" it does not qualify "traveling."

Mr. WARREN. The question is whether it would be necessary for him to travel at all. One of our distinguished Members said, in a private way, the other day to one of his coiaborers in the Senate that he does not propose to make any campaign in his State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then he would not have any necessary personal expenses of travel.

Mr. WARREN. In the meantime, a Senator who may be in the State next to him might consider it necessary to travel. I want to get the Senator's idea of the application of the word "necessary."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think each individual would be the judge of his own case.

Mr. WARREN. The necessary traveling expenses would then be a matter in the mind of the candidate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think so. That is for traveling.

Mr. WARREN. It is a very liberal construction, surely. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, who, I presume, is the Senator from Utah, whether in considering the bill the State laws have been taken into consideration?

I notice on page 5, commencing at line 12, it is proposed that between 5 and 15 days before a primary there shall be a report made here to the Clerk of the House of Representatives or the Secretary of the Senate, then that there shall be, between 5 and 15 days before the election, another report made; and then there is to be another report made between 5 and 15 days when the action of the legislature comes. I should assume that the more important time to get at the expenses of a candidate would be after it was all over; but there are three times in which he has to report before his election expenses may have ended, and it is presumed another report must be made afterwards as a finality. In some of the States it is prescribed that he shall file certain reports at certain times, and it would probably be a matter of some convenience and lessen his force of clerks, accountants, auditors, and so forth, if these times could be made to tally with the reports to the State and if the bill would require that he should make a report at the same time he is required by the State laws to make a report to the State.

Mr. LODGE. The report subsequent to election is already provided for by law.

Mr. WARREN. But this distinctly states at what date the reports shall be made.

Mr. LODGE. The only things not provided for are the reports of expenses prior to the election. The reports of expenses subsequent to election are covered in the previous act.

Mr. WARREN. That point has been considered well, but if those reports are made on the date that reports are made for the State in each State, the clerical duty will be lightened.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This law is intended to apply to three different conditions. Wherever there is a primary law in a State it will apply to that. Then the candidate for United States Senator before the primary election is required under this law——

Mr. WARREN. Excuse me a moment. I understand the Senator to say that it applies to the primary, and when the election takes place it applies there, and when the legislature acts upon it it applies again.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will bear with me——

Mr. WARREN. In the line of economy I think it would be better to frame it so that the Member of Congress or the Senator would not have to have a corps of clerks occupied 15 or 20 times with a copy of expenses and the various reports.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will follow the language of the law, he will see that his construction is not quite accurate.

Mr. WARREN. I am seeking information.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the first place, wherever in a State there is a primary law the candidate for United States Senator is required to make his report within not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of holding the primary. Then in that same State he must make his report, if he still continues to be a candidate at the time of the election, before the legislature.

Mr. WARREN. No; but before that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before that, if he is a candidate for indorsement at the general election, he shall make a report before that election is held. If he still continues to be a candidate before the legislature, then he shall make his report at the time specified in the law before the action of the legislature, and then, after the whole thing is over, he is to make reports covering his expenses that are not included in the prior reports.

Mr. WARREN. Then I am right in supposing that he has also to make additional reports in some of the States under the law? Where States have similar laws and the dates differ, then must he make a report to the State?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am inclined to think not. I think when the laws conflict the Federal law would supersede the State law upon that subject.

Mr. WARREN. Where the State requires that a man who becomes a candidate must make his report it would supersede, but where as a condition precedent the certificate of election——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we want to hear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators will speak so that Senators on the other side may hear.

Mr. WARREN. Where he is required by law before he can receive his certificate of election, say, as a Senator, to satisfy the secretary of state of his State as to his expense account, I hardly think that this law would entirely supersede the State law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not state it positively, but I think it would. The constitutional provision is that the legislature in each State shall regulate the time, place, and manner of holding these elections; but the Constitution provides that Congress may from time to time make and alter such regulations. When Congress has either made a regulation covering the subject which has not been covered by State law or made a law which conflicts with the State law, then it has altered the State law in that particular, and it would supersede the State law. At any rate, that occurs to me as being the proper construction of the constitutional provision.

Mr. WARREN. Let me ask the Senator, then, what would be the condition where the State law provided that a United States Senator could not receive the certificate of election of the governor until he had had his election accounts passed upon? What would be the Senator's modus operandi of getting the matter before the United States Senate that we might act upon it here?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I were the United States Senator, I would comply with the State law, so as to avoid any question about it. It does not seem to me that any great hardship would be entailed.

Mr. WARREN. Then make an additional report——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The candidate would file exactly the same account. There is no particular hardship in doing that.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it is no matter of personal interest to me, and perhaps to no one else present, but it strikes me that in legislation of this kind, where we all seem to be in a red-hot breathless run each to excel the other in the purity with which we are to clothe ourselves hereafter, it might be well to hesitate as we go along and take breath while we read the State laws and consider just how this proposed national law is going to apply, and how the national and State laws may harmonize.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator recognizes the fact that the State laws are not uniform.

Mr. WARREN. They are not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is very desirable that this matter shall be regulated and governed by a uniform law. That is what we have undertaken to do by this law.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I overlooked the fact that the Senator from Utah was a member of this committee. I should like to ask whether those supplemental statements provided in section 6 require that there be repeated in each successive statement all the data included in each proceeding, or does it stand by itself?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is a distinct provision that in a subsequent statement it is not necessary to repeat the former statement.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I overlooked that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The bill provides that—

> Each of said statements shall conform to the requirements of the following section of this act, except that the supplemental statement herein required need not contain any item of which publicity is given in a previous statement.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to introduce another amendment, which I desire to have read.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, who desires, I understand, to express himself on the pending question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Before another amendment is taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio temporarily withholds his amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have but a very few remarks to make. This proposes to authorize a man to spend money to be elected as a United States Senator; in other words, it merely limits the amount of the infamy. I thought the people elected the Senators. This might be termed "A bill providing a method by which men may elect a man to the United States Senate or secure his election." It is about as immoral a piece of legislation, or proposed legislation, as I have ever come in contact with. It provides in express terms that a man may expend money for his own election. I suppose if a man spent $5 for his own election it would be about as penal an offense or act as to spend $5,000. The bill provides on page 5:

> And such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value disbursed or used by such candidate * * * for the purpose of securing his nomination or election.

Now, there is a legislative license to do it. It is an affirmative proposition. The density even of the public mind at times is astonishing. We seem to be acting upon the assumption that men in the Congress of the United States are naturally vicious and unregenerate, and that they must be watched in every particular for fear that they will come in here through corrupt means. If I thought that there was a necessity for legislation to prevent me from getting here or staying here because of corrupt methods, I would walk out. I say that without any hesitation. I would not come. I noticed on Saturday that some one whose name was mentioned as a candidate, some man of consequence, said he would decline to enter into a contest with the conditions that surround it. Is it not apparent to Senators that this is a self-defamation? As a Senator suggested, each one seems to vie with the other in providing restrictions that shall prevent him from committing a crime. Each one is trying to outdo the other in saying "Hold me; if you do not, I am liable to do something bad." Does it not appeal to the people? If I were a constituency, with the exercise of the right of a constituency, I would not consider for a moment a man who would suggest the necessity of restraint against his violating the law of common honesty and decency. But for the body itself to propose that a man may spend money for his own election is beyond the beyond. What difference whether it is $5 or 5 cents or $5,000? No man should be authorized or seek to be authorized to spend money for his own election.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the people who are going to elect him. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest also to the Senator from Idaho that his statement could be made even stronger by reference to the part of section 8, on page 7, which not only contemplates that the candidate may expend money to secure his office, but that he may make promises of political appointment, providing he afterwards reports them to the Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; by——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should think it quite possible it is a fact that there are legitimate expenditures of money for carrying on campaigns, but it is hardly to be contemplated that there is much that is legitimate in the promise of the distribution of patronage.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a crime now. That has always been an offense against the law. But this law legalizes it. You may do it hereafter, if this legislation is enacted. You will be authorized to say, "I promise John Smith that he shall be postmaster." I am raising the point with an attempt at probably some little sarcasm. You will say, "Yes, oh yes; I will appoint a certain man to office"; and then in the report say, "On a certain day I declared to So-and-so that I would not appoint a certain man to office." It is pretty difficult to express a legitimate criticism on this kind of legislation. That is not the only criticism along that line. In other words, it authorizes men to buy office. That is what it authorizes. In our States we have a provision that a man must pay an admission fee before he enters the race and then at a certain wicket he must pay a further fee before he can go into the race.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEYBURN. Are we losing sight of the ordinary morals in Government? Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask in what respect and to what language this applies, found on page 7:

> Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him.

It does not do anything more than to require him to report whether he did such a thing.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; whether he has committed a crime.

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under oath?

Mr. BORAH. That is the design of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will agree to anything that the Senator says in regard to the design of this bill. I think its designs are so numerous, so obscure, and so plain that it is open to any charge that may be made against it.

Mr. BORAH. The statement has been made that this legalizes that kind of a promise or pledge. I ask, as a matter of information, how does it do it?

Mr. HEYBURN. It requires him to set it out in writing.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but it does not legalize the act itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does it say when he sets it out he shall thereafter be disqualified as a candidate?

Mr. BORAH. That is for this body to determine after he gets here.

Mr. HEYBURN. That presupposes he will eventually be elected.

Mr. BORAH. It does not presuppose that he will eventually be seated. The very object of the bill is to have information. The proper body will determine whether he shall be seated or not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then he must state that he has violated the law or committed a crime, and lines 18, 19, and 20 come in. Notwithstanding the fact that the people of the State may have vouched for him at the election he has got to come down here and swear, before he is charged with the fact, that he has not committed a crime. He does not have to wait until he is charged. That is a most unusual circumstance under modern conditions. But he comes in here and says, "I will come in here and file a pleading that I am not charged with any crime." The reply could be made, "Nobody has charged you with any crime; why plead before you are indicted?"

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to any Senator. I want some light on this subject to see what excuse can be made for it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand the Senator he complains about this bill because he says in effect it is a reflection upon the body itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. That may be an interpretation. Now, I do not complain of the bill. The word "complain" does not express it at all. I merely express my unqualified disgust at it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Perhaps I did not understand the Senator. Why does the Senator feel disgusted about it?

Mr. HEYBURN. At this legislation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; because it requires a candidate to make a statement as to the money he spent in bringing about his own election?

Mr. HEYBURN. On the basis that man is his own candidate. If the man is the people's candidate the people vouch for him, but for the man who is his own candidate I would not take all the vouchers and guaranties on earth, if that is all he has got to say for himself—"I want an office." I have always based the nomination or the selection of a man for the reason that he wanted the place in this Government as a very good reason with me for not giving it to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator will concede that sometimes men who are not absolutely perfect aspire to office and sometimes money is improperly expended in the election.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have never known it; I never came in contact with it in my life.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There are several cases in the history of the Senate where it has not only been charged, but has been proven beyond any question whatever. I think the Senator knows enough about the history of this country to know that money has frequently been spent improperly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Was not the law sufficient at that time to deal with the question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think so, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. It dealt with them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has dealt with one or two cases, but I think where there were one or two cases that have been reached under the old law a score have escaped.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the Senate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will not say in the Senate, but in the Senate and House of Representatives together.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the Congress of the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Scores of men have corruptly entered Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There have been scores of cases in the history of the Government, I have no doubt.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to know upon what information the argument was based. The presumption is that they came here honestly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the presumption——

Mr. HEYBURN. The fact has to be established under the rules of evidence that pertain in courts before I am going to convict him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The presumption of law is that every man is innocent when charged with a crime, and yet men do commit crimes.

Mr. HEYBURN. No man is charged, outside of Congress or official life, with the necessity of defending himself until he is charged with a crime, and here you propose that a man shall defend himself before anybody charges him with an offense.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator object to laws which make it a criminal offense for a public official to embezzle public money?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I would put such an official in jail and disfranchise him, but I would not make him prove his innocence until some responsible person charged him with an offense.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And yet, according to the Senator's logic, that is more or less an insult to all people engaged in the public service.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We require public officers to make reports of their accounts——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So that we may know what they are about and so that we may see whether they are committing offenses. What earthly reason is there that we should require other public officials to make stated accounts of their doings and exonerate Members of the Senate and House of Representatives from doing the same thing?

Mr. HEYBURN. They are not public officers when they are required to make the statements; they are only either voluntary candidates or persons whom somebody else has nominated for office, and it is a very serious question whether you have any jurisdiction over them at all. The only jurisdiction that you could exercise, in my judgment, would be at the bar of either House of Congress, and you would have to say to the one presenting himself, "Before you pass this bar you have got to prove that you are innocent of charges that have not yet been made against you, but that somebody may make." That is my idea of it. I doubt the jurisdiction of Congress to undertake to penalize the acts of a private citizen in regard to running for an office that he may never reach.

I am not going further into this. I do not expect to defeat the bill; it will be passed; but I do not intend, if anyone should ever read the history of congressional proceedings hereafter, to be classed among those who could not see that this attempt to penalize the acts of men in private life, who may never reach public life, is not the highest wisdom.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a word or two as to the purpose and theory of this legislation. It is that money spent in elections, if publicly accounted for, will only be properly expended; that a publicity law will put an end to the improper expenditure of money. Some States have gone further than that. They have limited the amount of money which a candidate may spend. My State passed legislation to that effect last winter. In England the corrupt-practices act limits the total amount of money that any candidate for Parliament can spend, as well as requiring publicity. The candidates have to show what the money was spent for, and they are limited in the amount they may expend. I never got the impression on account of that legislation that it was any particular reflection on the House of Commons or that it was a very corrupt body.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Government have authority to punish or reach the man who failed of election who may have expended money in violation of this law?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. This requires a statement of expenditure from all candidates at an election, whether elected or defeated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well. Then suppose there are five candidates, or any other number, for election, and the man who is elected is perfectly immune from any charge, are we to be required to sit here and try the defeated candidates? If so, would we do it?

Mr. LODGE. The body to which the candidate is elected has nothing to do with carrying out these laws; they would be carried out by the law officers of the United States, as State laws are carried out by the law officers of the State. In my own State, under the corrupt-practices act, if a man is charged with the improper expenditure of money, whether he be a defeated candidate or an elected candidate, it becomes the duty of the State's attorney to enforce the law, and that is the case here. This is not a question of a contested election that is to come before us, but it is by means of publicity to get rid of the improper expenditure of money.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was just to that point that I directed my question. Those who are unsuccessful, who are not elected, may be tried in the courts. Does that suspend the right of the one declared to have been elected to take his seat until the question is determined?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no, Mr. President; that has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it not be invoked against the seating of a man, in passing upon his papers, to charge him in a court somewhere with having been guilty of violating the law? And would we not have to wait until the court passed judgment on that?

Mr. LODGE. You mean if the case were brought against the candidate who was elected?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Would we have to wait until the court had passed upon it?

Mr. LODGE. I take it that that would be a matter for the Senate to decide.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, some little county court might tie up the Senate of the United States indefinitely.

Mr. LODGE. In the States, of course, the man would have to defend his title, I suppose, if the body to which he was elected saw fit to so direct.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Constitution says we shall be the sole judges.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, we are the sole judges of elections to Congress, and can seat a candidate if he has the proper certificate.

Mr. HEYBURN. And then have the State afterwards find, through its supreme court, and render judgment, that he was not entitled to his seat, probably a year after he had been sitting here.

Mr. LODGE. I do not understand that it would render a judgment of that kind. It would render judgment whether he had violated the corrupt-practices act.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the judgment must take some form. A jury does not simply find a verdict that a man has run away, for instance.

Mr. LODGE. Ours is a penal statute in Massachusetts. I do not recall the general statute that we have here, but I assume it is a penal statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. The cases involving a violation of the proposed law are subject to appeal, and the appeal would be from the United States court. The court sits probably once or twice a year, according to the jurisdiction of the cases tried. Then it would be appealed to the circuit court of appeals and there tried, and we would be waiting for a judgment that would authorize us to seat the representative of a State.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that would be particularly bad, even if it were so. In England contested elections have been tried for years in the courts and decided. I think it has been a much better practice than the practice of trying a contested election in the body, as I have seen it.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the situation is as bad as has been suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], we might lose a quorum while waiting for the courts to act.

Mr. LODGE. I think, Mr. President, there is no possible objection of that kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, this bill in no manner affects the existing power of Congress under the Constitution to judge of the qualifications and returns of its own Members; it in no manner extends or alters the State laws upon the subject of punishing for crime. If a man, after this law shall go into effect, should improperly expend money to bribe a voter, or do anything else that under the State law was corrupt, he would still be amenable to the law of the State, and he could be tried before the courts of the State and punished. If found guilty, he could be imprisoned under the law of the State. That is the case now; and this bill in no manner or form interferes with that power of the State or with the existing powers of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as opposing any workable legislation to purify elections; on the contrary, I would go as far in that direction as anyone. I realize that wiser hands and wiser minds than mine have framed this proposed legislation, but it seems to me it is rather clumsy legislation when taken in conjunction with the fact that certain States have passed laws on this subject which are very complete. The State which I have the honor to represent in part has passed a very complete law without, as I understand, any objection from any quarter. It is a good law. That law provides not only that there shall be reports made very frequently as to expenses, but there is a limit to them. The Senator from Utah is of the opinion that this law will take the place of the State law and abrogate that law where the two are in conflict. How does the Senator construe this law as to a limit or no limit on expenditures?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think it would affect the State law. It does not deal with that subject.

Mr. WARREN. Is there any limit in this proposed law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. None whatever.

Mr. WARREN. Why not have one?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The committee considered that question. They found that they were dealing with a problem that they could not work out at this time. I think myself that one of the most wholesome laws which we could pass, if we could devise one, would be a law limiting the amount of expenditure that should be made by a candidate for the House of Representatives or for the Senate, but we have 46 States to deal with, and the conditions are different in the different States; the voting strength is different in the different States; and when we undertook to deal with it we found that we were confronted with so many practical difficulties that we abandoned the attempt to incorporate such a provision in the law. It is true, as the Senator has said, that in his State there is a provision which limits the expenditure, and there is such a provision in other States. I think it would be an excellent thing if every State in the Union would adopt such a law as that, but this legislation will not in any manner interfere with such laws. It does not cover that field.

Mr. WARREN. Then, as I understand the Senator, while in some cases it does interfere—that is, it abrogates the State law—in this particular he believes the State law would be observed. Does not that bring about a peculiar situation. If this law puts no limit whatever, and one State puts a limit, we will say, of $50,000 and another of $500, what is to be the attitude of this body in that respect if it is to be the court? The Senator from Idaho, for instance—of course there is no personal reflection in this—may spend $50,000 out of his large wealth, and his State does not debar him from so doing, while I come in with a tag on my neck that I have disregarded the State law in that I have spent $506, or $6 more than the amount allowed.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator refers to the senior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WARREN. I was looking at the senior Senator [Mr. HEYBURN] but really referring to the junior Senator [Mr. BORAH]. I am only bringing these questions up for some explanation. Although I have no opposition to offer to this bill and do not propose to vote against it, I believe that it is not workable, and I think it will be so found. It seems to me the better way is to try out one of these things in our minds, at least to see where we are coming out. I can see where in the ordinary time of, say, 60 days, in which are to occur primaries and elections and all of that, that it is going to be a pretty hard matter for an honest and careful man to keep up with these statements in his State and in Washington also, especially if his home is a long way from Washington, as the homes of some of us are. According to the bill, as I read it—and the Senator from Utah agrees with me—there are three statements to be made before the final statement, making four in all. There are probably about three to be made in the State. That makes seven statements altogether. Does the Senator think that all those statements are necessary, and does he think that it is entirely proper to put men in that position?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think so, Mr. President. These statements are not going to be onerous. In the first place——

Mr. WARREN. Well, Mr. President, one will have to make the statements for himself and for all his friends.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish what I was saying. In the first place, there are certain expenditures that are eliminated altogether. You are not obliged to state what you spend for postage; you are not obliged to state what you spend for stationery or for telegraph or for telephone service or for necessary traveling expenses. Those are legitimate expenses, but are not required to be stated. The other expenses are the only ones necessary to be stated, and it seems to me that there is going to be no great burden, if a man is a candidate for United States Senator, in making a statement 10 days before an election and within the time specified after the election.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, honest men must sometimes submit—and they ought to be willing to submit—to inconvenience in order that adequate regulations may curb dishonest men. Honest men must often be subjected to regulations which, critically considered, may carry a certain imputation of possible dishonesty in order that dishonest men may be regulated. It seems to me that the objection to this bill amounts to no more than that.

The bill may not be a perfect one. The subject as a legislative subject in this country is still in a tentative stage. We do know that there has been much corruption in many places in this country. We know that not merely through the newspapers or by ordinary conversation, but we know it by what has appeared in the Senate. We know that it is desirable that there should be legislation which will establish regulations in order that honest men may have their own, and not have their rights taken away from them by dishonest men through corruption. This bill is a movement in that direction and in the right direction. We probably shall have in the future to amend and perfect it, as we are now trying to amend and perfect the legislation already passed; and we ought to be willing to subject ourselves to the inconveniences that may be imposed upon us in order that rules may be established that will curb the dishonest. For that reason, I am in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I regret that the bill came up this morning, or, perhaps, to state it more properly, I regret that I did not know that it was coming up this morning, and did not give it as careful thought and study as its importance deserves. I agree with the statement just made by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], but I go further and I say that it is no reflection upon any honest man when he is required to state to the public body, membership in which he seeks, every step that he took in order to secure that position, because these positions are not our positions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. In a moment. They do not belong to the men that happen to fill the positions now or who may fill them in the future. These positions belong to the public, and the public has the right to make the rules and regulations and to lay down and to specify just what each man shall do to give assurance to the public that every step that he has taken has been a proper step.

I do not agree to the doctrine that when we pass a law against larceny, applying to every citizen of the State, we thereby have cast a reflection upon the citizens of the State and denominate them as thieves. I do not agree to the doctrine that when we require a county treasurer or a State treasurer to file his accounts or when we provide for an examination of those accounts, we cast any reflection upon the honor or integrity of the man who happens to hold that position. So I do not and can not agree with the Senator from Idaho in the position he takes that these laws are reflections.

But if I have the import of this bill in my mind correctly, it seems to me there is one defect in it which at least we could to some extent remedy. The bill contemplates the filing of expense accounts, and in that respect I think it most commendable. But the bill does not undertake to limit, as I understand—and I wish I might have the attention of the Senator in charge, because if I am wrong I want to be put right—the kind of things of the classes of things for which you can expend money. Neither does it limit, as has been suggested, the amount of money which may be expended.

Mr. President, the suggestion has been made that those defects are cured by the legislation of certain of the States. I undertake to say that while a State legislature can pass a law making it a criminal offense for a candidate for the Senate of the United States to do certain things, which are in their nature wrong, and could punish him criminally therefor, the legislature of no State can pass a law which would affect the right of the man to sit in this body.

That is a question which must be determined by the laws of the United States and not by the laws of the State. I may be wrong in that, but I say this question is presented here to me rather abruptly. But I am asking Senators to consider that proposition, and if it be true that the Legislature of New York, for instance, has no power to pass any law which would provide the conditions or terms upon which a Senator might receive a certificate of election, or upon which he might take his seat here—perhaps they might control the certificate of election—then it seems to me this body ought at this time to go one step further than it has in this bill. I think we can properly provide for the uses to which money can be put. We can provide the legitimate uses and we can limit the amount.

Senators, I put it to you, will we be in any better position when this bill is passed than we are now with reference to one matter?

Documents have been placed in the hands of Senators, I take it—I received one—showing that in one of the States in the last election, in the primary contest, one of the Senators now sitting in this body expended $2 for every vote he received in that primary. Another candidate, if my recollection serves me right, expended $1.50 for every vote he received in the primary. Some other candidate expended a considerable sum—I have forgotten what; and one Senator sits here to-day having expended $107,000 to secure a nomination in the primaries.

I submit if that is not a bar to a seat in this body, then it ought to be a bar. I am not saying this to criticize the Senator who sits here now or to bring that matter now to the attention of this body.

But I do say that the Senate being the judge of the qualifications of its own Members and their right to sit here ought to provide by law now and here that no man can expend sums of money of that kind and gain a seat in this body by that means. And if you do not do it, all that you have succeeded in doing is simply to compel a man to make a statement of the amounts. There is too much truth in the statement that this bill almost apparently recognizes the right to spend money.

Now, we know money is spent. We must take a practical view of this question. There are certain legitimate campaign expenses that we have the right to incur. But we ought, in view of the development of matters now, to say at this time, and to say by law, that no man can occupy a seat here who expends $2 a vote or $1 a vote or 50 cents a vote for the votes he received.

I know it is difficult to solve this question, and I believe this committee has made an honest effort to draw a good bill. The bill has much of good in it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one second, and then I will yield. But I believe we can go further and ought to go further in regard to this matter. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Missouri referred to the committee drawing this bill. The Senator knows that this is not a Senate bill. It is a House bill.

Mr. REED. I mean the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment simply extends to the primaries what the House placed on the general election. The House determined this bill and its scope.

Mr. REED. As far as my point goes, the committee have undertaken to amend the bill, and they have amended it in a large number of respects, and I commend them for having added the things they did add. But I do say we ought to go further, and if this bill is not disposed of to-day—and I trust it will not be—I think amendments covering the matters I have suggested ought to be added, and I think they ought to be added by the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, while I am in perfect sympathy with the plan for the utmost publicity in all matters affecting the nomination and election of Representatives and Senators, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what would be the result if the candidate for the Senate refuses to make this report?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My attention was distracted for a moment. Will the Senator please repeat his question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The amendment which has been proposed here on page 7 provides that a report shall be made of any promise of any official position, and so forth. What would be the result if the candidate for Senator refused to make the report?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is a penal provision in the law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the penalty proposed in the law?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, I will have to look over the bill. I have forgotten it just at present.

Mr. BORAH. Another result would be, I presume, that a Senator would be asking admission here without having complied with the laws of his country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The penal provision is:

That every person willfully violating any of the foregoing provisions of this act shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

That is the penal provision in the existing law. This is simply an amendment to the existing law, and the penal provision applies to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On page 7 of the bill, then, you propose that the Senator who offends against the existing law shall make such declaration——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He shall make a statement of the fact whether or not he has given a promise or a pledge. If he does that, then so far as this law is concerned he is not amenable to punishment, but only in case he fails to make a statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It occurs to me this is rather an unusual provision. It compels under penalty a man to make declarations that he has violated the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. It is not a statement that he has violated the law. He is required to make a statement of the money he has expended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am talking about——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand. I was illustrating. He is required to make a statement of the money he has expended in the election. It may be perfectly honestly expended. But he is required to make the statement in any event. If he fails to make the statement, then he is amenable to the punishment of the law.

If he has made a promise or a pledge, even though he may not be amenable to any criminal punishment for having made the promise or pledge, he is required to make a statement of it. The language is: "relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I can readily understand why in the case of the expenditure of money it would be perfectly proper for us to pass a law requiring the candidate to make a statement of the money he had expended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Michigan will recognize that sometimes it is quite as vicious, and sometimes it is more vicious, for a man to make a pledge or a promise to another that in case he will support him for election to an office he will reward him with some appointment——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I quite agree with that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And sometimes far worse than if he had promised to give him money.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I quite agree with the Senator, and I want to reach that evil.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My idea about this law, not only with reference to that, but also with reference to the statement about money, is that its chief virtue will lie in its deterrent effect. A man knowing that he must put upon paper under oath a statement of the amount of money he has expended is not so likely to expend money improperly; and knowing that he must state under oath any pledge or promise he has made relative to an appointment, he will be less likely to make any.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But this is the situation, if the Senator please. There is a law prohibiting the making of such a promise. It is illegal in many of the States for a man to make a promise, and it ought to be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is true.

Now, shall we say in a Federal statute that a man shall swear that he did or did not make such a promise? In other words, can we compel him under penalty possibly to convict himself? I doubt if such a law is good, so far as that is concerned—to compel him. For instance, we insist that a man who is charged with crime need not swear that he committed the crime. You can not compel him to do that. What I am speaking about is the peculiar condition which arises here which compels a man to say either that he did or did not violate a Federal statute, and by saying that he did perhaps he will incur also the other penalty of the State law which prevents him or prohibits him from doing that particular thing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It seems to me we ought not to decline to pass a law out of tenderness for a man who has committed an offense of that kind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is not a question of tenderness——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The simple thing for the man to do who wants to avoid that difficulty is not to make any promises.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Surely; I realize that. But I doubt if by a Federal statute you can compel a man to say under oath that he has made a promise, if by so saying he incriminates himself.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator from Michigan whether he would repeal all of the internal-revenue statutes which require returns because some States pass laws making it a criminal offense to deal in spirits?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. ROOT. You can not regulate your Federal statutes by the variety of legislation in the States, can you?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I recall but one Federal statute—I may not be well informed—which compels a man to make a statement of a crime or an offense which he has committed, and that is the so-called white-slave law that was passed by the last Congress.

I realize that this Congress has the right to compel a report, but I doubt the propriety, if not the legality, of a provision which compels a candidate for office by threat of penalty to disclose a crime committed by him. To me this seems most unusual.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. BORAH. It does not compel him to make admission of the crime; it only compels him to make a report of what he has done. If he has committed a crime in getting here, then it only compels him to give up his office.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To do what?

Mr. BORAH. It only compels him in other words to clarify his record so that he may get this office. If he has committed the crime it is presumed he will not make the affidavit.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is not that a part of the penalty?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not. But if he does not make his report then it is in our power to judge whether he shall be entitled to his seat.

We make this a matter of public record in order to give us power to pass upon the question whether he shall be seated here.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In this connection I am reminded by the senior Senator from Oregon that it might make the law a little more effective if we were really seeking to clean up this body, to make it pure and clean, to incorporate as a part of the penalty the loss of the seat here if the candidate shall violate any provision of the law.

Mr. BORAH. That is completely in our hands without incorporating it here at all. We are the sole judges. It is absolutely within our power to unseat anyone for any reason which appeals to our conscience and our judgment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. So it is also within our power to determine whether a man has committed a crime against the election law without the passage of this law.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. But this requires him to furnish proof of his record.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is, for him to convict himself?

Mr. BORAH. No; the presumption is he has offended, and the presumption is that a man will not offend——

Mr. TOWNSEND. It may be this is usual, but, as I said, it occurs to me that it is not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A public officer charged with the collection and disbursement of public moneys is compelled to give an accounting, a statement of the moneys received and what he has done with them.

Now, the fact that that public officer may have embezzled a part of the funds is no reason why we should fail to provide a law by which he shall make a statement, even though in making the statement he may incriminate himself.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's indulgence a moment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do you desire to ask me a question?

Mr. REED. It is a part of this general running talk.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield the floor.

Mr. REED. I do not want to take the floor. I do not desire that.

But the statement has been made, in response to the Senator who has the floor, that the object of this law and that the effectiveness of this law consist in this: That men—candidates for the Senate—knowing that they will have to file these statements, will be deterred by the mere fact of the publicity from doing wrong.

I did not mean to take the floor from the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. All right.

Mr. REED. We ought to settle this matter right. I call the attention of Senators who have taken that view to this, that it is already the law in the State of Wisconsin that every candidate for the Senate must file a statement showing the amount of money he has expended. That did not deter the candidates in the last election. One of them sits here to-day, who filed a statement showing that he had expended—I think it is $107,000 by actual figures—$2 a vote. That did not prevent him from spending money.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Now, just a moment, before I am interrupted. Another candidate spent $1.50, if my recollection serves me right, for each vote he received. That did not deter him. The fact that he had to make a sworn statement of it did no deter him. They did make these sworn statements. Therefore, manifestly, that does not stop it.

Now, just to conclude what I was going to say and then I will yield—I am asking questions.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether there is anyone who desires to go on with the debate on reciprocity. If there is no one who desires to speak on the unfinished business, I ask unanimous consent that it may be laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Temporarily?

Mr. LODGE. Temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that House bill 2958 may be proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply desire to give notice that on Thursday, after the routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks on the reciprocity measure.

Mr. BAILEY. In order that there may be no conflict, I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Washington I will address the Senate on the same subject.

Mr. President, while on my feet I want to say that I left the Senate Friday owing to an injury to my eye, and I was not here when the vote was taken on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Had I been here I would have voted for his amendment. I have always voted to extract from the sugar schedule the peculiar protection to the Sugar Trust afforded by what is known as the differential duty, and while I have heretofore believed, and I now believe, in levying a revenue tariff on sugar, I am free to say that if the farmers of the West and the Northwest, and other sections of this country, are to have their products put on the free list, I intend to live up to the philosophy of my tariff opinion and put the agricultural products of the South likewise on the free list.

While I should have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, had that amendment been adopted I would then have voted against putting sugar and all the other products of the farmer on the free list.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to give notice that, following the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], on Wednesday next I will address the Senate on the reciprocity bill.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. Now, I put this to the Senators, who I think are very earnest and sincere in this matter. It being true that the fact that State laws have required publicity, and that that publicity has not deterred the expenditure by candidates of these large sums of money, it is manifestly a fact that the idea has not worked. Is it not true to-day that a man could come to this body under this law as you contemplate it and say that he had spent $500,000 to secure his nomination and election, that he had expended a million dollars to secure his nomination and election, and yet if you could not trace the use of that to some corrupt, felonious purpose he would under this bill still be entitled to his seat? It seems to me that you have a bill here with a great many regulations in it which are wholesome and proper, but that you ought to go further and provide the uses for which men can employ money and limit the amount, and then provide that upon evidence of a violation being laid before this body no applicant could take his seat.

I submit that in all good faith, trusting that we may get some light on the subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand the first part of what the Senator from Missouri has been saying, it is to deny the proposition which has been made here, that this law will have a deterrent effect upon people spending large sums of money or spending money improperly, because he cited some instances that he says exist—whether they do or not I do not know—where money has been expended in great amounts and improperly. No criminal statute deters everybody from committing a crime, but it does deter a good many. The statute against larceny is not universally obeyed. It does not deter every man, but it does deter a good many. So that will be the case with this statute. This statute will not deter every man from doing the wrong thing; it will not deter every man from making extravagant expenditures, but it will have, in my judgment, and very largely, a deterrent effect upon expenditures of that character.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator, who usually is very keen and lucid, in my opinion has used an unhappy illustration. It is true that statutes against larceny do not completely stop stealing, but every statute against larceny in the world provides a penalty for larceny; and if it did not provide a penalty for larceny other than that a man must admit how much he has stolen, thieving would go on in this world without let or hindrance.

The difficulty is this: I want to do the same thing here that we do when we pass a statute aimed at larceny. We not only prohibit the act, but we provide pains and penalties which are effective as far as human law can be effective. But we have here a statute which amounts to this: You are solemnly required to come in and say how much money you expended. This much of it, of course, is effective, that I am about to mention. You can say to whom and for what purposes. If there was a disclosure of corruption, of course the Senate could act when it came to admit a man.

But suppose an applicant for admission to the Senate lays down a certificate of election, and also lays down with it an affidavit stating that he expended a million dollars, that he hired a thousand men to go over the State and solicit votes, that he expended a very large sum of money for the purpose of having every voter in the State seen. Suppose that condition was disclosed, and it was manifest that the power and force of money had been the controlling and determining factor in the contest; there is in this law no limit to that amount of money. There is upon the statute books to-day no limit to the amount of money which can be so used.

I say, while we are legislating with reference to this matter let us go a step further. Let us provide a limit of the amount of money which can be expended, based upon the number of voters in a State, and let us provide what are legitimate or at least let us provide what are illegitimate uses for money.

The Senator states that an isolated instance makes no difference. Nevertheless, we can not afford to overlook the fact that it is a matter of public knowledge, although we had a law framed like this in the State of Wisconsin, and although that law provided that each candidate must file a statement showing the amount of money he had expended, it did not hinder the expenditure of $107,000 by one candidate, amounting to $2 for each vote he obtained. Neither did it deter the other candidates.

I take it that if that is all that is shown, regardless of the amount of money which has been expended, the Senate, under no precedent that has ever been laid down, would be warranted on that alone in acting to the ousting of a Member or refusing admission to an applicant for membership.

Now, is it possible that we can not go as far as they have gone in State after State. In State after State in this Union they have provided a limit that can be expended by the candidates for State offices. I think the States do not have that authority when it comes to a candidate for this body, at least they could not prevent his having a seat.

Why can not the Senate at this time at least go this far, and say that no man shall be permitted to take his seat in this body who had expended more than a given amount of money per voter in his campaign? Thus, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee one moment, you will do by this statute what you do in the States against the crimes to which the Senator referred. You will not only prohibit the crime, but you will visit a penalty that will be effective and deterring upon those who commit it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, Congress at one time undertook to deal with this subject of bribery in elections in a very comprehensive statute, which had a very wholesome effect and was in operation in this country for a number of years, but the party to which the Senator from Missouri belongs repealed it. Would the Senator be in favor of enacting the provisions of that statute again?

Mr. REED. I am not familiar with the statute the Senator refers to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I refer to the enforcement act of 1872.

Mr. REED. Well, sometimes an act that was aimed at a section of the country——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The act was not aimed at any section of the country.

Mr. REED. I do not care at this moment to discuss what has been done, because I frankly say I am unfamiliar with the terms of that act. I do not care whether mistakes have been made or have not been made. I say that now we are dealing with this question, the responsibility is upon us, and it would not help the cause of the Senator a bit even if he demonstrated that the Democratic Party had made a mistake—for we have made many—no more than it would help me to show that the Senator's party had made mistakes, for I believe that even the Senator will admit that it is not infallible.

But this question ought to be settled, and I appeal to Senators to settle it upon the broad and fundamental principle that we desire to make it impossible for any man to acquire a seat in the American Congress who does not come here with clean hands and a clean record.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it is a very simple thing for any man to stand here or elsewhere and outline a general policy as to what should have been done; but we are practical men, dealing with a practical question. I called the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that we had at one time a somewhat comprehensive statute upon this subject, which had been repealed by a Democratic Congress, and I called attention to it not for the purpose of reflecting upon that Democratic Congress, but for the purpose of showing him the practical difficulty of dealing with details of this character. We have brought in a bill here which goes as far as we think it is practicable to go just now. We have brought in a bill which we think nearly everyone on both sides of the Chamber could agree upon. If we had undertaken to devise the other things indicated by the Senator from Missouri, the committee would have involved itself in practical difficulties, and would have involved the Senate and House in practical difficulties as well.

The Senator speaks of providing for a limitation of the expenditures which shall be made. If such a law as that could be devised, nobody would favor it more heartily that I would, because I believe it would be, without question, a wholesome law, and many of the States have adopted such laws. The committee discussed that question, but we found there were so many difficulties in the way we thought this was all we could do. We could not provide for the same expenditures, for example, in some State like New York that we could in a small State like my own. We could not provide for the same expenditures in a farming State of broad area, where the traveling expenses are great, as in a small, compact State. I think there will readily occur to the Senator from Missouri the impracticability of undertaking to deal with this question now.

Now, let us take this step: The Senator agrees with me that this bill is right and we ought to pass it, notwithstanding the fact that the Senator may believe that his ingenuity is sufficient to cope with other questions and devise a law going still further.

Mr. REED. I trust the Senator will not give this debate any personal caste. I do not claim that my ingenuity is greater than the ingenuity of the members of this committee, nor greater than the ingenuity of the humblest Member of this body. I have spoken in the most complimentary way of the work of the committee. I have said that I believe they made an honest effort to improve this bill. I say so now. I trust the Senator does not mean that I am claiming to possess great ingenuity.

But I can suggest this as to the first difficulty the Senator named, which was that you could hardly place the same limit in amount upon the candidate for the Senate from a populous State that you would place upon the candidate who had to canvass only a small State with a small population. The answer to that is that you could fix a per capita expenditure so that you may say that a candidate for the Senate in a State per capita would be allowed to expend the same amount per capita—that a candidate for the Senate in the State of Delaware would be allowed to expend the same amount per capita that a candidate from the great State of New York would be permitted to expend.

I do not think that the graver difficulty. There is, however, more in the second observation the Senator makes as to the difference in canvassing a sparsely settled State for voters and canvassing a State where the population is condensed. There is difficulty in that.

I am not here to say that standing upon my feet at this moment I can devise a perfect plan. I am here appealing to the Senator as a great lawyer and as a great legislator—and I say that meaningly, for I entertain a very profound admiration for his ability—I am here appealing to him and the other members of the committee to see if they can not at least place some penalty on the use of an excessive amount of money, and within some kind of a limit regulate the expenditure. I trust my observations will be treated in the spirit in which they are offered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I myself suggested to the subcommittee, and I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], who sits near me and was a member of the subcommittee, will bear me out, that we ought to write into this law some provision limiting the amount of the expenditures, and the other members of the committee agreed with me.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. We began to think over the subject and we, all of us, came against these practical difficulties. Now, if the Senator from Missouri will sit down and undertake to draw such a law as that he will then discover, I think, the practical difficulties. It is a good deal easier to tell a man how to paint a picture than it is to paint it. You can tell what you want done in a general way, but it is much more difficult to devise the details of a measure.

Mr. REED. But the only way——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. REED. I just wanted to say——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield first to the Senator from California and then I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I was only afraid after what had been said—but I will not pursue it.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Utah that at least in a great many of the States there is a direct limitation upon the amount which may be expended by a Senator in his campaign. That is so in my own State, including the primary election. I merely wanted to suggest whether it might not be provided in this bill that a Senator should not expend more than he is allowed by the law of his own State. It would certainly meet the condition in those States where there is a limitation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would see no objection to that, except that it occurs to me that it would be superfluous, because the proposed law does not attempt to cover that, and I think the State law would be sufficient without repeating it in the Federal law.

Mr. WORKS. I want to say further in connection with this matter, and in response partly to what has been said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that it appears to me where a State places a limitation upon the amount to be expended by a Senator in his campaign, and his statement should disclose the fact to the Senate that he had expended a greater amount than that, that of itself might be a good reason for refusing him a seat in this body.

The contrary seems to be conceded by the Senator from Utah. I had supposed that this law was rather cumulative in its effect and that it does not take the place of the State laws upon the subject. For example, this law provides for certain statements to be made at certain times. A great many of the States have the same provision. It is suggested that that would be a great burden upon the candidate for office. Notwithstanding, I think both those laws, if they should be enacted, would have to be obeyed by any candidate. In other words, he would have to make a statement as provided for in the State law as well as the statements that are provided for in the law that might pass Congress. It might require three or it may require four statements.

Now, suppose the Senate, in considering the question as to whether an applicant is entitled to a seat, should find that he had violated the State law in any respect, and done it willfully, that, it seems to me, should be ample reason for refusing him a seat in this body. Therefore, there is no reason for fixing a limit to the expenditures here, as seems to be supposed by the Senator from Missouri. I do not know just how many of the States have these provisions. I know my own has and I know a great many other States have. Certainly it would leave open the right on the part of the States themselves to determine in each State how much is a legitimate amount to expend as a candidate for office, either here or in the other body of Congress. I was only suggesting this to the Senator from Utah, in view of what was said by the Senator from Missouri, as to that sort of a provision being necessary. I do not think it is myself. I am very much in favor of the bill as it stands.

Mr. BOURNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah the reason for the qualification as to two or more States, which is placed in section 8, page 4:

> That any person may in connection with such election incur and pay from his own private funds for the purpose of influencing or controlling, in two or more States—

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because that portion of the bill has reference only to the committee.

Mr. BOURNE. It does not apply to the individual expenditure?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it is a subsequent part of the section which applies to the individual Representative and the individual Senator.

Mr. BOURNE. What is the purpose of placing any qualification on two or more States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because any dealing with the committee is a jurisdictional matter. We are dealing with congressional committees. We would not deal with a State committee, because a State committee has to do with the election of a governor and the various State officers.

Mr. BOURNE. It is the national committee you are trying to reach rather than the State committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; we are dealing with the national committee in that part of the bill. The subsequent part of the bill covers the case of the Representative and the Senator individually. In dealing with committees we can only deal with national committees or committees which have jurisdiction over two or more States.

Mr. BOURNE. Then I understand it is the Senator's contention that any legislation which the States may enact will be operative and prohibitive as far as it affects Members of the United States Senate and Members of the House of Representatives regardless of legislation that we may enact here; in other words, that the laws now on the statute book will still hold.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think undoubtedly unless——

Mr. BOURNE. Unless they should be in conflict?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Unless they should be in conflict with some provision.

Mr. BOURNE. But where there is a 15 per cent limitation of expenditure in the primary and a 10 per cent limitation in the general election in the State law, would there be any conflict under this bill, if enacted?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think undoubtedly not. This law would not in any manner affect the State law in that respect.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, this proposed statute certainly does not make valid any improper or illegal practice. The mere filing of a statement, though such a statement may include an account of evil doing, does not condone the wrong.

It would seem unnecessary to speak on this subject, but some statements have been made in the debate which might lead to the conclusion that by merely filing an account of his transaction a candidate is exempted from punishment for whatever may be illegal in those transactions. This is not true.

What does this statute do? First, it recognizes the existence of certain facts. What are those facts? Large expenditures of money by candidates for office or by committees selected to promote the interests of those candidates and the party to which they belong.

Second, the statute provides that the facts shall be known. It is a very strained argument to insist that, although the incumbents of many offices must, under the laws now on our statute books, file statements of all their transactions to the very last dollar or penny which they may disburse, it is nevertheless a hardship upon them in the all-important question of their election to compel them to file a similar statement which must throw light on the means employed for their selection.

Certainly, if it is proper that transactions in the administration of an office must be made public, it is equally and even more proper that the methods employed by a candidate in seeking election—by making promises or by the expenditure of money—should be published to the country.

Mr. President, I think it is inevitable that as a supplement to this statute either the States acting in unison or this Congress will pass a law limiting the amount that a Senator or a Representative may expend in a campaign for election.

But let us look at the pending proposition carefully and dispassionately. The proposed statute is a great advance over any existing legislation. The last Congress passed a law compelling campaign committees having jurisdiction extending over the Nation or even over two or more States, as well as individuals and corporations, to file a statement of the amount of money subscribed or expended with a view to influencing national elections.

The statement provided by that legislation was to be filed after election. It was based upon the theory that in the present temper of the public mind any statement filed before the election would unduly prejudice the chances of the candidate. Therefore it was limited to a statement to be filed after the election.

Let us see how much further this proposed statute goes. First, the House of Representatives in the bill sent over to us required statements to be filed before as well as after the election. The Senate has gone much further. The committee reporting this measure has taken account of the fact that the best way to prevent or punish delinquency is to regard it as personal. Consequently the committee framed a further requirement that the candidate must file a statement. This was done with the conviction that he who was first and primarily responsible, the one whose qualifications were to be tested by the House or the Senate, should himself be made subject to the law.

Next to that, by a sweeping provision, primary elections as well as final elections are included, and very properly, too, Mr. President, because in a great many States, both North and South, the primary election practically determines the result.

Then the Senate committee, recognizing a fruitful source of corruption, has added a still further provision that a candidate must file a statement of any promise that he has made involving appointments to office. Nothing could be more demoralizing to the electorate than widespread promises for the distribution of patronage.

Mr. President, I recognize the force of the argument made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] regarding difficulty in framing a Federal statute which will limit the amount that may be spent by a candidate.

First, there is to be borne in mind the difference in the size and population of the different States. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] answers that by saying you can allow the expenditure of a certain amount per capita, but, in addition to inequality of population, there is marked inequality in density of population. Still further, in some States it is customary to hold large rallies and enormous meetings, which cost a very considerable sum of money. In other States where customs are different, no such expenditure is incurred. In some sections of the country, according to present ideas, the candidate is expected to respond generously to a great multitude of demands upon his purse, and he is regarded as mean and penurious if he does not make generous response. In other States it is very properly a misdemeanor to make such a demand.

But, Mr. President, I suggest a stronger objection to placing any limit in this bill. In any movement calculated to inaugurate reforms the legislator must conform his methods to the sentiment of the people; he must govern his course with constant reference to the good which he can actually accomplish. Here are evils, to wit, the use of money in elections and the promise of offices, both deep-seated and of long standing. The offense of spending money is condoned in many localities; it is regarded as an act that is not malum in se, but malum prohibitum. As I said a minute ago, in some places when a man is nominated for office he is expected to respond liberally to the importunities of churches, societies, and lodges, and to be a liberal contributor to any and all causes whose agents may approach him. The expenditure of considerable sums is regarded as a perfectly proper thing for any candidate.

The legislator may readily cross a narrow brook, but he can not leap across a broad chasm. He may depend upon the educating and punitive force of law to accomplish certain results, but he can not depend upon it to work a revolution or to create a millennium. What is always the first step toward reform? It is to cast the electric light of publicity upon existing evils. This bill accomplishes all that.

Mr. President, I have great faith in the fairness of the American people. I do not believe that we place enough confidence in the beneficent effects of publicity. To use an illustration, compulsory arbitration has been opposed most strenuously by labor unions as well as by employers; it seems to deny the freedom of contract; but if a board enjoying public confidence will examine critically into the facts in a labor dispute, then make them public so that the side which is in the wrong will be revealed, I believe that will be almost as effective as a mandatory law, because public sentiment will do the rest. You can always rely upon the sense of justice innate in the American people.

So if it is made public that in an election a candidate has expended $100,000 the people are going to inquire what that means. Perhaps they will ask another question: Is it not about time that we should call a halt and establish the ideal that a man of limited means who can spend only a few hundred dollars is entitled to our suffrage rather than the man who can spend $100,000?

I do not say this, Mr. President, as an argument against placing a limit, because I believe that in due time that will follow; but this is a great advance over our present statutes, and we must leave until a later day the rest of this salutary reform, which I trust will do away with corrupt influences in elections.

It is with a sense of regret that I mention certain instances to show that over considerable areas of our country popular sentiment has not in the past approved a corrupt-practices law. In one of the cities of the Middle West, with a population of thirty or forty thousand, it was proven that the mayor elect had expended more money than he was by law allowed to expend in obtaining his election——

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean more than his salary?

Mr. BURTON. More than the law allowed for election expenses. The law in that State allowed him to spend in his campaign for election a certain per cent of the salary of the office. The question was taken into the courts and a decree was entered ousting him from the office. Under the statute another election was held to elect a successor. The candidate first successful was not disqualified by the fact that he had been ousted, and he again entered the contest. "Yes, my fellow citizens," he said, "I did spend more than the law allowed. Why should I not be generous with my money? I suspect that my opponent spent a great deal more than I did, but he did not swear to his expenditures as I did." What was the result? After he had been ousted, he was again elected, and this time by a majority three times as large as he had before received.

In my own State of Ohio, about the year 1896, I took some part in framing a corrupt-practices act, limiting the amount that a candidate might spend. In two consecutive elections I most cordially complied with the provisions of that law, which allowed a congressional candidate to spend, I believe, about $700 for nomination and election. I believe the ideals relating to corruption in elections are just as high in Ohio as anywhere else, notwithstanding Adams County, but the impression became prevalent that that statute helped the dishonest man; that when a man was a candidate for office his brother or his uncle or some friend might spend money for him, or that he might actually spend it himself and conceal the facts in his affidavit. So, after a trial of some three or four years, the law was repealed. There was not sufficient popular sentiment behind it to retain it on the statute books. Last winter the Legislature of Ohio, I am glad to say, framed a drastic law on this subject. I think this Ohio statute marks as advanced a step as has been taken in any State.

So, Mr. President, I believe in this bill practically as it stands. I shall offer an amendment on another subject, requiring the candidate who has made any promise to an association, a committee, or a corporation as to how he will vote on any question to make that promise public. I think such an amendment aims at a serious evil. Everyone acquainted with politics is familiar with that evil—how, in the heat of a campaign, those who are seeking to promote the interest of some association or committee or corporation or some large body of voters will interview a candidate or write him a letter asking him, "What do you promise to do on this point? What are your views on this subject?" The candidate returns an answer, and that answer is more or less secretly circulated among those who wish him to vote one way or the other.

Last fall I saw two illustrations of letters of that kind which were sent to candidates for office. One demanded from him a promise to vote a certain way on a specific schedule or item of the tariff law; another was this question, "If you are elected to Congress, will you support such an employers' liability law as association so-and-so shall present for your support?" No doubt those who sent that request had no wrong intent. Doubtless they thought everybody else was doing the same thing and that they, too, might do it with the utmost propriety. Yet the answer in both cases would not have been known to the general public.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; I am always glad to yield to my friend from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Would the reply to a request contained in that kind of a letter, to state the candidate's position upon the question asked, come within the inhibition of the Senator's proposed amendment?

Mr. BURTON. It is included.

Mr. BORAH. I think constituents have a right to know how the candidate feels.

Mr. BURTON. That is just what I am aiming at.

Mr. BORAH. That they shall not know?

Mr. BURTON. No; that they shall know. If a request for a promise as to his attitude on a matter of legislation is presented to a candidate, and the candidate answers the question, both the question and the answer must be filed, so that they may be made public. That is the object of the provision. Everyone knows how it is in a contest in which the liquor question is involved. The friends of prohibition will go to a candidate and ask, "How do you view this subject?" Those who are interested in the liquor traffic will go to him and say, "How do you stand on this question?" Perhaps there may be involved no immediate issue on that subject, but everybody knows that a large number of voters will be influenced in their suffrage by the candidate's personal opinion on that question.

In the electorate we have a great many people who have fads, who care more about some subject entirely outside the domain of a legislator's duty than they do about his views on the tariff or upon the election of a President or any of the great national issues that are before the people. It is perfectly proper that all the views of a candidate upon pending or prospective legislation should be known, and such a provision as I desire to present is in line with the object of this bill—to insure publicity. Let every man know just where the candidate stands, not only how much money he has spent, not only whether he has made any promises of offices and patronage, and if so to whom, but also has he made more important promises, namely, how he stands on certain subjects of legislation?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator the amendment before him?

Mr. BURTON. I have it here. I am frank to admit it sounds at first flush a trifle drastic, and at first I included in it something that I have since erased. Mr. President, the amendment is pending, and I ask that it be now read at the desk, as I want to make some general remarks upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 21, after the word "stated," it is proposed to insert:

> And every such candidate shall also include therein a sworn statement of any request soliciting or demanding any promise or expression of opinion relating to any pending or proposed legislation, which shall have been made of him by any corporation, committee, or association, or any official or agent thereof, together with his answer thereto and a a copy thereof; and any official or agent of such corporation, committee, or association, or anyone acting on their behalf, who shall request of any candidate for election to the House of Representatives a promise or expression of opinion upon any pending or proposed legislation shall, at the same time, transmit a copy thereof to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or in the event that such request be made of a candidate for election to the United States Senate, then such copy shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Why limit it to the Senate?

Mr. BURTON. It includes the House of Representatives; both the House and the Senate are included.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the principle covered by this amendment seems to be a good one, but do I understand that the Senator has stricken out the word "individual"?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; because I thought that impracticable.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty with the entire amendment, it seems to me, is the fact that it might be very difficult to comply with the proposition during a campaign in which numerous letters were written to the candidate regarding the issues involved. It would seem that the public would be entitled to know any specific promise that was made or any view that a candidate might entertain.

I believe that to be so; but in the way the amendment is drawn will not the candidate probably have to file every letter and answer covering any subject which has been discussed between himself and his constituents in the campaign?

Mr. BURTON. To guard against that as far as possible it it provided that the one who makes the request shall also transmit it. I recognize, Mr. President, the possible difficulty, but is the fact that it is difficult to comply with a requirement a sufficient reason for excluding it? The Senator from Idaho and all of us recognize the substantial evil aimed at. A man is sometimes elected to office by obtaining a large amount of support through secret promises that ought to have been subjected to the light of day when he made them——

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that proposition.

Mr. BURTON. On the other hand, he very often makes promises hastily and injudiciously, and when he comes to Congress finds that he is not a free man. It is about time that we promulgated the idea that not only shall expenditures and promises with regard to office see the light of day, but the more important promises with regard to legislation.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. CRAWFORD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BURTON. To the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose a situation should arise wherein certain constituents should write and ask you to give them a promise and you should decline to do so?

Mr. BURTON. Then that fact would naturally be made public.

Mr. BORAH. That constitutes your position just the same.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that that would be included under the phraseology of the amendment, except in the requirement that the person making the request would have to file it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Say, for instance, on reciprocity with Canada.

Mr. BORAH. Silence upon a subject in a campaign would be part of a man's platform or of his position with the people, if he were asked to define his position and failed to do so.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; on a good many questions I am inclined to think that silence would be the very best platform he could adopt—that is, he ought not to make too many promises.

Mr. BORAH. But the difficulty is that the constituency is entitled to know not only what you are willing to promise, but the constituency is entitled to know whether or not you have any views at all upon a certain question.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. For instance, take some issues which are now before the Senate—say, Canadian reciprocity. As to that, I think in some localities some of our comrades here would want to be entirely silent, which would constitute their declaration in a measure. I agree with the Senator from Ohio as to the principle which is covered by his amendment. I was only suggesting these considerations as matters which, if they could be, ought to be covered by a practical provision in the amendment. I do not know that they can be, but you are going to require of the candidate the publication of practically his entire political correspondence during the campaign.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so, Mr. President. I have had a good deal of experience, having been a candidate for office 10 or 12 or even more times, and I think I could count on the fingers of my two hands the number of requests I have received in each campaign that would come under this provision. Some of these requests were very important, but they were not numerous.

Mr. BORAH. I should think it would be sufficient to require that they should send a copy of your letter to the opposition campaign committee.

Mr. BURTON. That is exactly what the candidate would naturally do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to find out whether the only purpose of this provision is to have the public know the position of a candidate on a public question, or whether it is not also to have the public know whether or not the candidate in some secret manner has pledged himself so that he was compromised beforehand?

Mr. BURTON. Both would be included.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, if the latter is included, why should the amendment be confined to formal inquiries made of the candidate in writing and answers made in writing? If he placed himself in a compromising attitude toward some great corporation, would it not be more likely for them to get him into the secrecy and privacy of their office, and in the presence of a witness exact a promise from him of which there is no written evidence whatever, and, having secured such a promise, ought he not to be required to make a statement whether or not he had made such a promise or committed himself in such a manner, even though there was no written evidence of it, but it was an oral transaction?

Mr. BURTON. This amendment is broad enough to include oral requests. It provides that there must be made:

> A sworn statement of any request soliciting or demanding any promise or expression of opinion relating to any pending or proposed legislation, which shall have been made of him by any corporation, committee, or association, or any official or agent thereof, together with his answer thereto and a copy thereof.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But his answer is not written.

Mr. BURTON. Only by implication can you say it is not written.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me, to get the full purpose for which the Senator is striving, it ought to be clear that the candidate should be required to divulge a secret agreement of that sort, even though orally made, as well as written statements.

Mr. BURTON. I concede that; but I have the same opinion about that as about the provision requiring a limit on expenditures. You can not go too far at one step. I think this would be a very advanced reform and would virtually cure the evil and any refinements, any methods of evasion, which might develop, can be treated as they arise.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I am quite sure that the Senator from Ohio does not desire to take any step in the way of an amendment that would imperil the final passage of this bill. He has himself suggested that we had better not undertake to go too far, but leave some of these important matters to be looked after in the future. It seems to me that this is one of them. I agree with the principle for which the Senator is contending. I think I should be willing to go quite as far as he would go in an attempt to purify elections, but this is certainly going a long way, as the Senator must concede, and the result of it may be that if the suggestion is carried into the bill in the shape of an amendment the bill may finally be defeated on that account. I think we ought to content ourselves by securing, if we can, a reasonable measure at the present time, and not undertake to load it down with amendments that might have the effect I have suggested. I only suggest this to the Senator from Ohio for his consideration.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, by no means do I wish to imperil this bill, but I do rank side by side these three sources of corruption: First, the expenditure of money; second, promises, presumably secret, controlling appointments to office; third—and I think it is worse than the second—promises, again presumably secret, relating to the stand which the candidate will take on some matter of legislation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Ohio will understand that I am not antagonizing his views on that subject.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. WORKS. The difficulty that occurs to me is that of covering this matter by any provision that could be carried out. It is certainly a very difficult matter as it suggests itself to me, and therefore it must, just for that very reason, imperil the passage of the bill. But it is not because I do not agree with the principle at all that I make the suggestion.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have a full expression from the members of the committee who considered this bill. I want to make this suggestion: Suppose this amendment goes into the bill. It could be either yielded in conference or else perfected there. I have no pride of authorship in regard to it; only it seems to me that it is an important provision and should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I entirely agree with what the Senator from Ohio has said about promises of this character. They sometimes are quite as corrupt, as he very well says, as promises to reward a person with an office or the payment of money; but we are making a good deal of an advance with the bill we have got. It is extended far beyond the provisions of the House bill. This is a matter of detail, to which I have not myself been able to give any consideration, and I hope the Senator from Ohio will not press the amendment to this bill. Let us pass this bill as it is.

Mr. BURTON. The amendment forbidding anyone to give another authority to make promises has already gone in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. That amendment, of course, is in, and it is entirely proper, but I hope that the Senator will not at this time press this amendment.

Mr. BURTON. What I fear, Mr. President, is that it will be some years before this question will again come before us. Should the bill pass in its present form it might well be regarded by both Congress and the country as a most excellent bill and a great advance in a much-needed reform, and in that event it would be a considerable time before this proposed amendment could again be presented to the Senate with any chance of success.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That may be, but of course the Senator can offer it as an amendment at any time, and it will be considered by the committee, I have no doubt, and fully considered by it.

Mr. BURTON. I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Suppose this goes on as an amendment. It might be possible that the House and the House committee would like it better than some of your other amendments, and would desire to have it remain in the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That may be.

Mr. BURTON. I certainly do not want to embarrass the passage of the bill. I would not for a moment think of that. What would the Senator from Utah say to allowing it to be adopted with the understanding that if it is antagonized by the House, it shall not for a moment endanger the bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think if we had a full attendance of the Senate it might meet with some antagonism here. The bill as it is drawn and presented certainly is now very well understood and has been considered. The amendment now suggested by the Senator from Ohio has not received very thorough consideration by the membership of the Senate, and I think—and I am very frank with the Senator from Ohio, and I hope he will not understand that I am antagonizing the principle of his amendment—it may prove embarrassing to the bill. I would prefer, speaking for myself, that the bill might be passed as it is now before the Senate.

Mr. BURTON. Under the circumstances I do not feel like pressing the amendment, and I withdraw it. But it is possible the Senate may again at some future time hear from this amendment or something more carefully drawn along the same line.

I recognize very keenly the difficulty involved in drawing a provision which will be in proper legal form and at the same time correct the evil at which we are aiming. I have the utmost confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Utah, and, on his suggestion and the modified suggestion of the Senator from California, I will not, as I say, press my amendment.

I desire to say just a few words in regard to this whole question of corrupt practices and legislation pertaining to the conduct of legislators. I think it is due to the House and the Senate to say that the evils at which we aim in this proposed law are not primarily or principally the fault of candidates for office.

It is a prevalent opinion that he who offers himself as a candidate for popular suffrage is, as it were, like a colporteur or circulator of tracts; that he goes around distributing $2 bills or $5 bills among the electors as though he enjoyed it.

Quite to the contrary, no one so much abhors the expenditure of money in an election contest as the candidate himself. But it is a system which has developed with time.

In the first place, the candidate finds that the average voter is entirely indifferent. He does not like to take off his slippers, put aside his cigar, and go out in the evening to register. And when a person comes around and reminds him that he must register in order to vote, though otherwise a very intelligent citizen, he displays oftentimes a woeful ignorance of the issues of the day.

He needs education. He says, "What are we electing in this year—1910?" "Oh, it is a Congressman, is it?" "Yes." "Last time I voted was two years ago. I believe I voted for McKinley for President. No; it was not McKinley I voted for for President. It was Roosevelt, I guess." And he shows also an utter lack of familiarity with the issues of the day. Thus, literature is necessary; brass bands are needed to bring audiences together and to arouse enthusiasm.

No evil so deep-seated as this corrupt use of money in elections could exist and exist so long as it has unless the great body of the people were responsible for it.

When a man is a candidate for Congress or the Senate there are some idealists who think he ought to pursue that course which would surely lead to defeat. That is not human nature. A man desires to be elected, and if it is necessary to spend money he is liable to do so, and if he is not able to spend it himself, he is liable to call upon others to spend it for him or furnish it to him, and thereby put himself under an obligation that is most dangerous to his impartiality and efficiency as a legislator.

But let the average citizen, the "composite citizen," as some call him, recognize his responsibility; let him realize that he must register and vote regularly; and, again, that he must not make up his mind on public questions by studying a few headlines and cartoons, but that he must devote to them the same careful attention that he gives to his private business, then the necessity for any considerable use of money will disappear.

So we are seeking in this bill not to reform the candidate alone, but to reform the great body of the people as well.

Some one who had experience and who enjoyed that most satisfying pleasure of having his experience crystallized into law framed a statute which is now a part of the law of the State of New York:

> Any person who solicits from a candidate for an elective office money or other property, or who seeks to induce such candidate who has been placed in nomination to purchase any ticket, card, or evidence of admission to any ball, picnic, fair, or entertainment of any kind, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

I understand my own State has incorporated virtually this provision in a statute passed a few weeks ago, though I have not yet seen the final copy of that law:

> But this section shall not apply to a request for a contribution of money by an authorized representative of the political party, organization, or association to which such candidate belongs.

That is a law to prevent imposition upon or cruelty to the candidate, and we need such statutes just as acutely as we need statutes prohibiting him from spending money.

Some of these requests bear a very peculiar form. One of the humorists of New York declared in what he vouched for as a correct statement that once when he was mayor of a town not far out of New York City a message came to him in about this language:

> The cause of tariff reform will be very greatly benefited if the Fourth Ward Democratic Club should receive a keg of beer.

And so it has become customary to make these claims upon a candidate, to regard him as one who is under the very greatest obligations to the people.

Mr. President, if there is any one thing that we should aim at in our legislation, it is to stimulate, to sustain, to secure the independence of the candidate for office and the incumbent in office, so that he shall come here not only with clean hands, but untouched by those things which besmirch, free from those associations which tend to lower him and his ideals of public life.

This bill I regard as a most important step in the right direction. I trust it will serve to educate public opinion. Probably it is not the last word in statutes governing the use of money in elections. I believe that before very long we will have stringent laws in State, and alike if necessary and valid in Nation, limiting the amount of money which candidates for Congress can spend.

That is necessary because it gives to the candidate for office that equality of opportunity of which we all boast as a characteristic of American citizenship, so that the man of limited means is put on the same plane with the millionaire.

I trust, Mr. President, that not only will this bill pass, but that its salutary effects may become apparent, and that it may receive such further amendments and support in State and in Nation as will make it thoroughly effective and certain to purify our politics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Ohio has withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I withdrew the amendment in view of the statement of the Senators from Utah and California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if this is the proper time, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, to be added at the end of the committee amendments as before.

I had to draw it hastily, and it may be imperfect, but in a measure at least it expresses my thought. The amendment is as follows:

> No such candidate shall expend, or cause to be expended, a sum in the aggregate exceeding 10 cents for each voter in his district of State. No candidate for the Senate shall directly or indirectly contribute any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any member of the legislature of his State. No candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall promise any office, or his influence or support for office, to any person, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person. No person guilty of violating the provisions of this act shall be seated in either the House of Representatives or the Senate, and if any person shall be seated he may be removed if found guilty of such violation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers this as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon the amendment. As I have already said to the Senator, the committee is in entire sympathy with the principle expressed there. But I suggest to the Senator that on a matter so far reaching and so important as the one he is suggesting we ought not to undertake to make an amendment in a moment of time here. The conditions in the various States differ so radically that an amendment of that character must be drawn with the utmost care.

Here is one State, for example, like the State of Texas, which is as large—larger than all New England put together. The population is scattered. What may be a proper expenditure in thickly settled Massachusetts, thickly settled New York, or little and thickly settled Rhode Island may be entirely inadequate in Texas; and it is a matter that ought to receive very careful consideration and very careful analysis of the whole situation.

While I am in hearty sympathy with the principle behind this amendment, and myself suggested to the committee when the matter was being considered that the bill should contain some such provision as that, we met with so many practical difficulties in attempting to formulate it that we deemed it wise not to encumber or embarrass this bill with an amendment of that kind.

While I know that this is not in any manner the object of the Senator, I say to him that an amendment of that character may prevent the final adoption of this bill at this session.

Mr. REED. Of course I do not know why the adoption of an amendment which will breathe the breath of life into this bill should prevent its passage. I am not prepared to say that the amendment I have hastily drawn here, and of which I have but the pencil memoranda, is either the perfection of reason or that it is as good an amendment as could be prepared.

But, Mr. President, if I had not been convinced of the necessity of such an amendment as this before this morning, the remarks of the Senator from Ohio would have thoroughly convinced me. And I say that with the most profound respect for the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator from Ohio insists that we are likely to get our legislation in advance of public sentiment, and states that it is taken for granted and is expected in many localities of the country that candidates shall submit themselves as victims for that class of people who believe it is right to levy a sort of tribute of some kind upon them.

Mr. President, that affords the best reason I know of, or one of the best, for the passage of this bill. If there be communities in this country where by a simple practice the candidate is expected to be held up—if I may use a slang or semislang expression—if that be true, the inevitable effect of it is to bar from aspiration to either the Senate or the House of Representatives any and every man who is not financially able to withstand that kind of onslaught.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Under this amendment a man in some of the States of the Union could expend $150,000 or $200,000.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that while the principle, the philosophy which lies at the basis of the Senator's contention, is correct, the rule which is sought to be established is not the proper rule. That is to say, we ought not to measure it by the number of people in the State; there ought to be, it seems to me, a fixed sum. If you say so much per head, it gives a man in certain States of the Union an opportunity to spend all the money any man would want to spend in an election.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator through?

Mr. BORAH. I am through for the present.

Mr. REED. I prefer to answer that a moment later——

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. REED. After discussing it. Mr. President, if the sentiment does exist to a large extent in different States that a candidate must submit to this plucking process, then, as I said at the moment the Senator from Idaho interrupted me, it bars the aspiration to the House of Representatives or to the Senate of any man who does not possess the means to enable him to submit to that sort of practice, or else it compels the candidate to accept contributions from those institutions which may be interested in legislation, and therefore are interested in having candidates who are favorable to them. If this sentiment exists, how long will we wait for that same hungry and thirsty crowd who make up that sentiment to demand that we shall legislate against them. If you have a community or a sentiment of that kind, the people who make these demands will be the last people to demand legislation that they shall not make the demand.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I am going to answer the Senator's question in a moment. I prefer, rather, to proceed in this way, but of course will yield at any time. I should like to just elucidate this thought, if it be worthy of it.

So that for the protection of the candidate as well as for the protection of the public officer against those very communities where that bad condition exists, a protection against all classes of people who may be inclined to indulge in it regardless of what community they live in, some such provision as is now offered ought to be enacted.

Mr. President, it has been suggested here upon the one hand that it takes more money per voter to reach the voters in sparsely-settled States than it does in congested communities, and I grant that is true. If you have a limited amount of money and if the limit is placed low, while it does deprive each candidate perhaps of the chance to do all he would like to do, still each of them has an equal opportunity and the right to expend an equal sum of money. Therefore I can see no objection if we place the amount low enough.

I concede to the Senator from Idaho that the amount at 10 cents would probably be too much in a State, for instance, like New York. It would admit of the expenditure of too much money. Yet I undertake to say that plenty of senatorial contests in that State have cost more than 10 cents per capita, but I am willing to accept an amendment that in no event shall any candidate expend more than $25,000.

Mr. President, I do appeal to this body to look at the question regardless of the committee's standpoint or the standpoint that the committee has produced something, and therefore it should not be amended.

There is no question about this fact: Money has been playing too great a part in every election in this country for many years. There is no man who can deny the fact that it has come to be used to such an extent that we have almost begun to believe it is legitimate. Yet I will undertake to say, sir, that outside of the mere matter of a candidate traveling from one portion of the State to another in order that he may visit the voters, outside of the mere expenses necessarily incident to the hiring of a hall in which to meet them, and outside of the writing of letters and sending out of addresses, not one penny can be legitimately expended in politics.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What is the voting population, for instance, of the State which the Senator represents?

Mr. REED. It is about 700,000, and I concede to the Senator no such amount as $70,000 ought to be used. As I said, I drew my amendment with great haste, and it probably is entirely too high.

Mr. BORAH. That is the objection I make to considering it at this time. I think the Senator will concede that whatever unanimity there may be as to the principle which is covered by his amendment, the manner of reaching it is one very difficult to determine upon, and it does seem to me we ought not to adopt a rule which would permit the expenditure of $150,000 in one State and of $3,000 in another State or a thousand dollars in another State.

While the principle for which the Senator is contending may be entirely correct, and I am inclined to think it is, yet we must adopt some different rule from that in order to accomplish what we desire to accomplish. We certainly do not want to say by an act of legislation that you may spend $150,000 in New York legitimately. That would not be in accordance with our theory of this legislation at all.

Mr. REED. The criticism of the Senator is, I think, well taken; but as I understood the matter this bill was coming on now for a vote. I had no time to prepare an amendment upon a sliding scale. But the difficulty suggested by the Senator can easily be met, without treading on new ground at all, because it is already provided in the laws of at least one State that I know of that a candidate is permitted to spend a certain number of cents for the first 10,000 votes, a smaller sum for the next 50,000, and it is a very, very low sum for the number in excess of that.

What I should like to see done is to let this measure lay over until to-morrow at least, and I will at that time have an amendment that I think will meet the objection of the very distinguished Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When the Senator undertakes to reframe his amendment, he will find other difficulties arising. I can assure him of that.

But I wanted to ask the Senator this question: Under the amendment which is proposed by the Senator fixing the amount of expenditure upon a basis of 10 cents for each voter, in the State of New York the expenditure would reach over $150,000. In the State of Nevada the expenditure would be about or a little less than $1,000. In the State of Rhode Island, over which a man can drive almost in a day, which has only four counties, the expenditure would be four or five or six thousand dollars. Does not the Senator see that in Nevada, for example, a man must legitimately spend very much more than he is required to spend in Rhode Island?

The traveling expenses alone for a thorough campaign in that State, much of which has to be driven over by team and wagon, at great expense, will exceed a thousand dollars, and the Senator will find difficulties of that kind coming up all the time just as the committee found them. The committee was not idle in this matter. It was thoroughly considered; and I venture to say to the Senator from Missouri that after 14 or 15 men were considering this matter day after day the Senator in dealing with it alone is quite likely to find difficulty also. I hope, for the success of this bill, which the Senator agrees with me is a great step in advance, he will not press his amendment, and if it is pressed I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that in Oklahoma the maximum expenditure by a candidate for the United States Senate is $3,000, and in Nebraska I believe it is $650.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the manager of the bill——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. I have no doubt his conversation was more interesting than anything I can say, but some of these objections urged by the Senator seem to me to be unsound. First, there is excluded from the bill now the traveling expenses of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not from the Senator's amendment.

Mr. REED. It is in the bill excluded; and I undertake to say that they are not required to make any accounting for them. Therefore, my amendment applies and was intended to apply only to those other expenditures which are outside of personal traveling expenses. So that meets the first objection of the Senator.

The next one is that if there are only 10,000 voters in the State of Nevada and a man is permitted to expend only $1,000 in expenses, that is no harder upon Candidate A than it is upon Candidate B, and if there is a limit upon the one that same limit operates upon the other. If there are only 10,000 voters in the State of Nevada, I say that $1,000 is enough to appeal to the reason of every one of them, and if you want to do more than appeal to the reason, then you come within the principles of corrupt practices.

If granted that to expend 10 cents per capita in a State like New York would be wrong, therefore I say I desire to modify the amendment so as to provide that in no event shall more than $25,000 be expended by any such candidate.

But the Senator again speaks of the State of Delaware, where, with the dense population, he says $6,000 might be used, and that you can travel over the State in a day. I grant you that, but, Mr. President, if you limit it to $6,000 in the State of Delaware, will you not do better than they have been doing in that State?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Rhode Island was the State I referred to.

Mr. REED. Well, Rhode Island; for heaven's sake in Rhode Island, then, of all the States in the Union, if you could limit it to $6,000 or $60,000, I have no doubt it would be a great step in advance.

You may sit here until the hair grows white upon your head and until it falls down about you like the snow, and you can make objections of that kind to every measure that is proposed which intends to limit these expenditures. It is better to have a law that would allow a little too much to be expended in one way and a little too small an amount possibly in another than to have no limitation and come in here with a bill which amounts to this. I can come to the Senate under this bill; I can lay down my affidavit that I expended $500,000 in my primary election; I can say that I employed a thousand men and sent them throughout the State as my personal agents; I can say that I put advertisements into newspapers and bought what space of the country newspapers of the State I could. They do not sell that space much in Missouri, I thank God, but they do some there, and they do in many States. I can go on under this bill as it now stands and admit all these expenditures. I can admit that I hired teams at every voting precinct in my great State and that I expended $100,000 in doing it. I can come here with a sworn certificate that I used so much money that no poor man dared run against me, and, Mr. President, it affords no reason for barring me from this high tribunal. In fact, the bill almost by its language admits the right to use money in that way. But if you will add a few simple phrases at the end of it, such as I have attempted to draw here, you will have a corrupt-practices act that has a soul in it.

Now, gentlemen say wait. How long shall we wait? The Senator from Ohio has said to us that these practices have existed for years in this country. He tells us that there are communities where they absolutely wink at matters of this kind; and it is too true that that is the case. He tells us that conditions are bad and that there has been a general public demand for this reform, and after telling us there is a public demand for this reform he says to us the people are not ready for a real reform. We are not really ready to cut the cancer out or to open the ulcer and remove it from the body, but we are going to tickle it with a feather.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I trust the Senator will not misrepresent what I said. I know he does not intend to. Does he believe that a provision requiring the filing of an itemized statement of every dollar expended prior to the election is not a real reform?

Mr. REED. I believe that that will help. I believe it would help to pass a law that said that every man who stole a horse would have to go and post a notice of it, but it will not stop horse thieving half as quickly as it will if you add, "and the man who steals a horse shall go to the penitentiary."

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Missouri think that this extension of the requirement relating to statements so that it applies to the primary elections is not a substantial reform and far greater than has ever been contemplated before?

Mr. REED. I have said—and the Senator from Ohio and myself can not be at variance on this—that the bill brings some measure of relief. It is a step in the right direction; but, Mr. President, if ahead of me is the proper goal that I know I am to arrive at some years hence, and if I know that public opinion and the lash of public condemnation is going to drive me there if I have to be driven, if I intend to go there ultimately and I have legs under my body that will carry me there to-day, I propose to go there to-day, because that is where I ought to go.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, one other question or two. The Senator from Missouri will concede that this provision requiring an affidavit relating to promises for office is a very distinct advance, far away in advance of anything that was proposed in the House of Representatives. Indeed, the provision in regard to primaries was voted down there, was it not?

Mr. REED. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By the present House?

Mr. BURTON. By the present House.

One other question. Does the Senator from Missouri for a minute believe that if anyone should file a certificate showing that he had expended $500,000 in the State of Missouri or in any other State, that he had engaged wagons all over the State in connection with the election, he would be elected? Does he believe it for a minute? Does he not believe it is best to take a reform that makes public and brings to light of day every corrupt practice, every undue expenditure of money, rather than to go rainbow chasing after something that will bring him into conflict with the laws of the States and that is very difficult of application in any event?

Mr. REED. Ah, Mr. President, every time any man has ever stood up in this world and asked to have something done that ought to be done, somebody has been there with that same old rainbow. It has been the means of excusing more men for bad arguments than all the other manifestations of nature. The rainbow always comes into play. Now, let us see if it is rainbow chasing. Will these amendments kill this bill in the Senate? What Senator will arise and say that he will vote against the spirit of them; and if so, what is the reason?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not hesitate a moment to say that I will vote against any bill which will legalize the expenditure of $15,000 to elect a Senator. I think it would be corruption contained within the statute itself.

Mr. REED. The Senator is not as fair as he generally is, because the language of the amendment, as I drew it, would not legalize it. If it is legalized, it is found in the body of the amendments that were offered by the committee. But the Senator knows, as I have said not once nor twice but thrice within the last 15 minutes, that I offered the modification that in no event should more than $25,000 be expended in any State.

Mr. BORAH. That amendment has not been offered yet.

Mr. REED. I thought I had offered it, and I think the Senator will find it. But the Senator interrupted me here, it seems to me, almost without purpose. I was discussing the question whether amendments carrying out these ideas would kill this bill, and whether the Senator from Ohio was correct when he said we had better take that which we can get instead of chasing rainbows.

I have never been much of a rainbow chaser in my life, and I hope I am not chasing any now when I say that I do believe that amendments embracing the thought, at least, that is contained in these I have offered will not kill the bill here. If it will not kill the bill here, will it kill it in the House of Representatives? Who has the temerity to stand and speak for the House of Representatives and say that that body will not vote for a limit of some kind and a penalty of some kind? And if not there, then where else is the influence that could transform the effort to obtain these wholesome measures into rainbow chasing? Is it to be found in the White House?

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Missouri still further yield for a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I would call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that he has not answered my question. Does he believe that if any candidate in Missouri or any State in the Union should file before a primary or regular election a statement that he has expended, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, the sum of $500,000, including large sums for hire of wagons, and so forth, having spent that or any inordinately large sum, he could be nominated or elected to the Senate from Missouri or elsewhere?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if every voter in the State knew that a candidate for the Senate had expended so enormously large a sum as the Senator states, I believe in the State of Missouri it would beyond question defeat him if the voters knew it. I do not know how it would operate in Adams County, Ohio, but I am afraid it might greatly increase the popularity of the candidate.

Mr. BURTON. Of course I recognize, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that I have the very great disadvantage of explaining that one county in my State—not without a large infusion of population from outside the State, and handicapped by lack of ready communication with the outside world—displayed rather crude conditions in recent elections, but I most decidedly shall defend the State of Ohio in its standards relating to elections against any State in the Union. I trust the Senator from Missouri will not give too much emphasis to Adams County.

Mr. REED. I will not.

Mr. BURTON. I will say one thing about the residents of that county, that they are doing what many counties have not done. They are taking care of their own delinquencies; they are sentencing their own criminals or those guilty of misdemeanor; and they are going on their way in the path of reform as many other counties have not.

Mr. REED. I want to say so I can not be misunderstood, that the Senator put his pointed question to me with reference to my own State, seeing fit to select Missouri, and I simply in kind came to a small part of his own State. But to reflect upon the State of Ohio, to reflect upon any great State of this Union, is something I trust I never will seek to do.

Mr. President, I have written out here, by the kindness of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] while I was speaking this addition to my amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit me to ask him another question before he offers his amendment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator recognizes the fact that in some of the States there are primary elections and general elections following and in some of the States there is only one general election. Does the Senator not think that the candidate for office before a primary election and also before a general election should be permitted to spend in the aggregate more than one who is simply a candidate before the general election? The Senator's amendment makes no distinction of that kind.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; and I should not undertake to make such an amendment. I live in a State where we have senatorial primaries. I passed through one myself. I not only live in a State where we have senatorial primaries but I live in a very populous State, in a State where we have great cities and where we also have a great rural population. I live in a State moreover that is so divided by its physical conditions that it is probably as hard for a candidate to canvass that State as any other State of the Union.

I say to you, Mr. President, and to the Senator, that the greatest thing you have to contend with is when somebody enters the political arena who can hire men to go over the State and who can buy space in newspapers, and there are only a few of them that will sell it, thank the Lord, and who can by virtue of their money obtain an advantage. Yet I say that $25,000 is the utmost limit that any man has any right to expend even in that State, and if it is put to that limit it is too high for the State of Missouri.

But when the Senator undertakes to say that because we have a primary election and some other State does not have a primary election, and another State has some other system of election, and a fourth State differs a little bit more, and that we can not pass any act here until we can evolve some plan or scheme that will fit every one of them to an exact nicety, he undertakes to say that we ought not to legislate until we can legislate in absolute consistency with what we might call perfect reason.

Now, the act of legislation is a perfect act. We have to face it every day here in this body. It has been faced in every session of Congress since we have had Congresses. What is the practical solution of this? If you can not get to an ideal condition let us get as near as we can. Let us pass a law that limits the amount per capita, and let us make it high enough to cover those States which have limited populations, and let us put an aggregate limit upon the amount that can be used in any State under any circumstances.

I wanted to say a moment ago that I offered this addition to my pending amendment, which was written for me through the kindness of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]:

Provided, however, That no candidate for the United States Senate shall expend exceeding $25,000, and no candidate for the House of Representatives shall expend exceeding $7,500 in any campaign for nomination and election.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment in the form he has just read.

Mr. BURTON. What is the amount for a Member of the House of Representatives?

Mr. REED. I am going to make it $3,000.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Make it $2,000.

Mr. REED. I will make it $2,000.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Missouri will yield, I will say that, according to the law of the State of Ohio, which was passed on this subject, the amount that a candidate for Congress could spend both for nomination and for election was approximately $750. You will see what confusion we will create by such a provision. The national law will provide one figure, perhaps very materially larger than the State law allows and to which candidates have already adjusted themselves. I would feel some degree of reconcilement to the amendment if it referred only to States which have not yet adopted a law on this subject, but in any event I think it is premature; we are going as far as is best in the bill as it came from the Senate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Missouri be good enough to send the entire amendment to the Secretary's desk?

Mr. REED. As soon as I can write it. I do not think the objection of the Senator from Ohio is good. I do not think that because the State of Missouri limits, as she does limit, the expenditure of a Congressman, and it is limited by the per capita regulation to something like six or seven hundred dollars, the fact we say here that nobody shall be seated who expends more than $2,000 militates against that Missouri or that Ohio law. I think that law still is operative, and this one simply provides a penalty to be fixed. But what I say in this matter could go further. I think it is easy enough to reconcile that and to provide that in no event should any candidate expend more money than was lawful under the laws of his own State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as modified.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I suggest that the Senator from Missouri might read his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is prompting the Secretary, so that the Secretary will by no possibility make a mistake in the record. The Senator from Missouri is putting in form his amendment. In the meantime, if any other Senator desires to discuss the bill, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have read this bill as proposed to be amended with some interest and attention.

On June 25, 1910, the Congress of the United States passed an act providing for the publicity of campaign committees operating in two or more States for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected. The substance of this act was to define the meaning of the words "political committee" and to define them as organizations "which shall in 'two or more States' influence the result, or attempt to influence the result, of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected."

The purpose of this act obviously was to avoid interfering with the conduct of committees in individual States, as State committees who were engaged in influencing the result of an election in which Representatives in Congress are to be elected.

The present bill retains this definition of the "political committee" which is required to make public its campaign receipts and expenditures as a committee operating in two States or more, and thus excludes a committee engaged in one State in influencing the election of Representatives in Congress. A committee therefore organized by the Republican Party in Pennsylvania or by the Democratic Party in Georgia can expend any amount of money and the law will require no publicity at all.

I regard such a bill as almost worthless. It seems to protect the public interest and will abate the public demand for publicity, but it is merely a "sop to Cerberus"—merely a grossly defective compliance with a sincere, righteous demand for full publicity.

I think the limitation of this publicity of contributions, as proposed in the pending measure, is much too narrow, and that where a committee or an individual (whoever they are and whether operating in "two or more States" or in one State) undertakes to influence the result of an election in which Representatives in Congress are to be elected such committee or individual should be subject to a corrupt-practices act as well as complete publicity. Such committee or such individual who attempts to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected should not only be subject to a corrupt-practices act, but where such committee or individual attempts to influence the result of an election at which United States Senators or presidential electors are to be elected or nominated a thorough corrupt-practices act should apply.

The proposed bill providing for publicity of contributions is obviously too narrow. If to enlarge it means to defeat it, I should not venture to demand its present amendment. I do not know whether it represents the view of the Senate or not, but we have at least a convenient parliamentary situation by which the bill may be made efficient in the highest degree. I think the substance of the English corrupt-practices act ought now to be made a part of the law of the United States. It was for that reason that on a recent occasion I submitted that law to the Senate and called the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the English law.

I trust the Senate will agree to add a corrupt-practice prevention amendment to apply to the nomination of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives and presidential electors, as well as providing for complete publicity of all committees whether operating "in two or more States" or in only one State.

It is absurd to lock the front door and leave the back door wide open. Such an act is essentially a mere "joker." It reminds me of the lines of Macbeth—

> Then be these juggling fiends no more believed
> That keep the word of promise to the ear
> And break it to the hope.

I think the bill is too narrow in dealing only with the elections of Representatives. It should involve also the election of Senators and presidential electors. It should not only deal with the election of Representatives, Senators, and presidential electors, but should deal with the nominations of Representatives, Senators, and presidential electors for the obvious reason that nomination in many States is equivalent to election, and it is as of great importance to have clean nominations in such instances as to have clean elections. It is of more importance, in such instances, to have honest nominations, because the election is a matter of course when the nomination has been made in certain States.

I think the Congress of the United States should adopt a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act that would invalidate the election of any Representative or any Senator or of any presidential elector where such election was obtained by obvious fraud.

Such an act as the English corrupt-practices act should be in full force in the United States in its application to both Representatives and Senators, both as to their elections and as to their nominations.

The first question is:

HAVE WE THE POWER UNDER THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES?

Under the Constitution of the United States, I am of opinion Congress has the power not only to amend this bill as proposed by the committee, but to pass a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act which shall assure the integrity of the National Government.

It is generally agreed that the Government of the United States is a government of delegated powers. It is not, however, a confederacy. It is a nation, and the Constitution was interpreted by the Civil War, and under the issues determined thereby the United States is a nation and not a federation. It is an indivisible union of indestructible States. The Nation has citizens of its own who are not necessarily citizens of any State. The Constitution was established by "the people of the United States." The Constitution prescribes that Represenatives shall have attained the age of 25 years, been 7 years citizens of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen as a Representative; and that a Senator shall be over 30 years of age, 9 years a citizen of the United States, and shall be an inhabitant when elected of that State in which he is chosen, thus designating certain qualifications of age and residence for Senators and Representatives.

These qualifications can not be changed by law, but the law may add other qualifications under the power of self-government. It might provide, for example, that no one ever convicted of an infamous crime should be qualified as Senator or Member. The Senate and the House would then judge of the qualification, as authorized by law, and determine for itself, without review, "the qualifications" of its own Members under section 5.

Section 4, Article I, provides that—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators. * * *

Section 5 provides:

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

The Constitution provides that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member. It provides that Senators and Representatives shall be paid their compensation out of the Treasury of the United States, and so forth. It gives Congress the broadest powers to conduct all of the necessary functions of a National Government, to lay and collect taxes, to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to coin money and fix the standard of weights and measures, to establish post offices and post roads, to grant patents in the arts and sciences, to establish the Supreme Court and courts inferior to the Supreme Court, to define and punish piracy and felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations, to declare war, to support armies and navies, and—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

If each House has the power to be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own membership, and if Congress has the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers of the Constitution and the powers vested in the Government or in any department or officer thereof—it seems to me that Congress has the power to pass a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act. Certainly Congress has the right, under section 4, to determine the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, and if this be true, it can declare what manner of holding elections would be corrupt, dishonest, and unfair, and therefore invalid.

Is it possible that Congress, having the right to determine the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, is denied the power of declaring what would be a dishonest and void method and manner of holding such elections?

I am strongly opposed to the Federal Government interfering with the State elections, but I believe that if a State election of a Representative or of a Senator is grossly corrupt, Congress not only has the power, but that the power carries with it the duty of rejecting a Representative or a Senator elected by corrupt practices, even without any statute declaring an election void because of corrupt practice, but I also think it would be a sound moral and ethical statute to plainly forbid corrupt practice and penalize it.

For that reason I give my adherence to the proposal of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in amendment of the pending bill. I had intended to submit such an amendment myself, and was only prevented from doing so by unavoidable absence.

Section 5, which gives each House the right to judge of the elections and qualifications of its own Members, and section 4, which authorizes Congress to make or alter any State regulation affecting the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, obviously contemplated the right of Congress to determine the integrity of such elections. It is a most modest exercise of the power of Congress over elections to limit the expenditure of money and forbid the election of Federal officers by corrupt practices.

Mr. President, the fundamental right of self-preservation is involved in this question of the power of the Government of the United States to assure and require the integrity of the nomination and election of Senators, Representatives, and presidential electors.

If Congress is powerless to prevent the corrupt nomination and election of Senators and Representatives and presidential electors—if these vital officials of the Federal Government can be bought with money by open bribery, and the Congress of the United States is powerless to make such bribery and purchase of seats in the Senate and in the House of Representatives a crime—then this Government has no constitutional right to protect its own life.

The fundamental proposition that the Government of the United States has a right to protect its own life in this way can not be denied.

There is no answer to that proposition; there can be no answer to it. It is fundamental and it is conclusive. No man of intellectual integrity, I believe, will find himself able to deny the right of any government to protect its own life by such a fundamental provision as this.

Such a denial would be monstrous, contrary to sound reason and common sense. Every individual recognizes that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and it is inconceivable to imagine a government, intended by its framers to endure, having no right to protect its own life.

The Congress of the United States, in my judgment, has the power, both under the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, to pass a corrupt-practices act and to pass a bill providing for complete publicity not only of receipts and expenditures of committees engaged in influencing the election of Representatives "in two or more States," but engaged in the "nomination" as well as election "in a single State," of Representatives and also of Senators and of presidential electors.

All the money in the world can be used without publicity under this bill if you leave a committee "in one State" at liberty to use secretly such funds. Of what avail is your inhibition on a committee dealing with two or more States if you leave a committee operating in individual States free to act without publicity, to spend money contributed by the special interests of this country in buying Senators and in buying Members of the other House? I object to the narrow manner in which this bill is drawn—

In so far as it relates to committees only which operate in "two or more States";

In so far as it relates to elections and not to nominations;

In so far as it relates to "Representatives" and not to "Senators" and "presidential electors";

In so far as it fails to describe and forbid corrupt practices;

In so far as it fails to declare void any nomination and election procured by corrupt practices.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator must criticize the existing law and not this bill.

Mr. OWEN. I criticize the existing bill, because this bill proposes to make law, and we are here for the purpose of making law. I am not criticizing existing or past law, excepting so far as may be of interest and of service in writing a law now, by correcting and improving the pending bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me——

Mr. OWEN. I will yield to the Senator, with pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will get to the point of my suggestion. The suggestion I make is that the thing to which the Senator from Oklahoma objects is in the existing law, in the statute law, and is not in this bill. The existing law provides—that is, the law passed June 25, 1910——

Mr. OWEN. Does the existing bill provide for the control of a committee in individual States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the existing law does not.

Mr. OWEN. Does the existing bill provide for publicity of the receipts and expenditures of an individual committee in the States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The existing bill does not, because it is simply an amendment to the existing law.

Mr. OWEN. That is what I am complaining of, that the existing bill is not drawn properly in that respect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is a House bill sent over to us, and it simply proposes to amend the existing law by adding to it certain provisions.

Mr. OWEN. That House bill is before the Senate of the United States, and I have a right to suggest or to propose an amendment to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I have a right to suggest an amendment to it, and I have a right to point out its deficiencies in that particular. It does not avail the Senator to say that my objection relates to something else and omit to point out that my objection is well founded against the amended bill as brought in by the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was simply directing the attention of the Senator to the fact that he was criticizing the bill for not——

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I am not criticizing the past bill; I am criticizing the present deficiency in the pending bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I quite understand that, but what I was suggesting to the Senator was that his criticism applied not to the bill, but to the existing law.

Mr. OWEN. It applies to the bill; and the observation of the Senator from Utah, which applies to the act of June 25, 1910, which is not before the Senate, is immaterial and irrelevant. This bill ought to be made complete now. Now is a good time. If not, why not? We have two Senators here on the floor now whose seats are assailed on the ground of corrupt practices. The whole world is looking at us, and here we sit as a great legislative body failing in our duty to make thoroughly efficient a law which we have now the opportunity of making efficient. I will not agree that this matter shall pass without my protest and without an earnest effort, so far as I can make it, to have a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act now made a part of the bill. The parliamentary opportunity is here. Whether the will of the Senate of the United States is clear on this question will speedily be known.

I favor an amendment enlarging the publicity of campaign contributions. I should favor a much more drastic amendment and provide for a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act. It will not require a long act. An act of 20 lines will suffice. All that is necessary is to make void any election of a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives who uses money in excess of a reasonable limit. That will suffice. It will be a substantial advance, at all events. My State limits the expenditures of a Senator to $3,000. That is not very large, but it will suffice.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator suggests that the law should make void the election of a Senator or of a Representative brought about by corruption. What would the Senator say to the provision in the Constitution which makes each House the judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own Members? Would the Senator think that, in view of that provision——

Mr. OWEN. I should say that that gives constitutional warrant for that which I now propose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But the Constitution says "each House." The Senate has no right to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns——

Mr. OWEN. Each House will determine the question of qualifications, elections, and returns if we pass this bill amended as I propose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator does not let me finish.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be glad to hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If you make provision that the election of Representatives, for example, shall be void under certain circumstances, then the House alone is not the judge of the qualifications of its own Members. The Senate has participated in it. As I understand the constitutional provision, it was intended that each House, acting separately and alone, should be the judge of the qualifications, and so on, of its Members.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Utah is too ingenious. It is more ingenious, in my judgment, than sound. If this provision becomes a law and a statute of the United States, it becomes a rule of law under which the constitutional right of each House to determine the qualifications of its own Members shall be exercised.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, if the Senator will permit me, suppose we pass a law of that kind and a case arose under it involving the election of a Representative, and two-thirds of the membership of the House concluded that he ought to be seated, could the Senate do anything about it, could anybody do anything to enforce the law? Would it not all depend upon each House to do as it pleased with the matter, the matter having been committed to each House by the Constitution?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, of course each House would pass upon the qualifications of its own Members, but they would pass on them under the light of the rule which is laid down by the statute law of the United States in pursuance of constitutional authority.

I most thoroughly approve the bill which has passed the House providing for the publicity of contributions before the election, but I believe the whole bill should be amended so that it should apply to every committee which undertakes to influence in any way the election of Representatives in Congress or of Senators, whether "in two or more States" or in a single State.

I hesitate somewhat to offer such an amendment for fear that it may bring about the defeat of the bill, but if it be acceptable and it can pass, I should like to see it done, and, with a view to testing this matter, I shall offer such an amendment at the proper time. If Senators do not want to adopt it, that is for them to determine. If they do not like the form of the amendment and object only to the form, another form can be easily contrived and arranged. If they object to the principle proposed, they must indicate that by their vote.

Mr. President, the committee amendment set forth in the new section 8 covers the expenses of primary or nominating elections for Representatives and Senators. I cordially acquiesce in this proposal, for the reason that in many States, my own included, a nomination is practically equivalent to an election. In my own State, we put a limit on the amount of money which a citizen can expend as a candidate for nomination. I think this limit would be a wise provision to apply to the whole United States, and that an amendment to this bill would be reasonable and just, providing that no candidate should expend in a campaign exceeding $7,500, including the primary and the election.

It has been suggested that the Federal Government has no right to "invade" the State by this requirement of publicity of campaign contributions and expenditures in the nominating primaries. This suggestion of "invading" the State seems to me to be the use of terms intended to arouse the prejudice of those who feel strongly on the so-called "States' rights issue." Such an argument stirs up ancient prejudice. In point of fact, there is no "invasion" of State rights in requiring persons who seek to become officers of the United States to make public the amount of money which they expend in having themselves nominated or elected to a Federal office. The nomination of Federal officers and the election of Federal officers is Federal business and not State business.

Every citizen of the State of Oklahoma is a citizen of Oklahoma indeed, but he is also a citizen of the United States, and as a citizen of the United States he has a distinct relation to the Federal Government that should not be ignored or lost sight of. It is true that citizens of States are also citizens of the United States, and have a double function. Citizens of the State pay taxes to the State and as citizens of the United States they pay taxes to the United States. Citizens of the State may render military and other duty to the State and as United States citizens may render military duty to the United States, but the nomination and election of Federal officers by United States citizens is Federal business, and it is of vital importance to the Federal Government that the nomination and election of Senators and Representatives should be honestly made and not bought with money in the open market.

I have no sympathy with the strained arguments and forced construction of the Constitution which Senators squeeze into their interpretations of our national organic laws that prevent the Nation from putting an end to the devilment and corrupt practice that has degraded our Government.

Mr. President, I understand perfectly well that men of the best intentions may use money on a large scale for publicity during a campaign in having brass bands and flambeau torchlight processions and in buying uniforms for a thousand men at a time to stir up enthusiasm. It is a very bad practice. It is bogus; it is mischievous; it has a bad effect upon the public mind. It causes a large expenditure of money. We have not been in this country led to regard such conduct as such corrupt practices; yet it would be far better to class such expenditure of money as a corrupt practice, to confine the expenditure of money in elections to legitimate purposes, and not subject the voter to the hypnotic effect of brass bands, flambeaux clubs, and the hurrah that confuses his judgment and excites his loyalty for one faction or the other.

It would be far better to give no such artificial and grossly unfair advantage to a rich candidate over a poor candidate.

The Federal Government has the power and the plain duty to see to it that its officers should be honestly nominated and honestly elected. Some have suggested that the election by a State of its own Senators is a State function, and that such State should not be interfered with in the choice of its own Senators. The answer to this is that the Senators chosen from Illinois vote upon the taxation of Oklahoma and of every other State in the Union. The Senators from Rhode Island vote upon the business of California as a part of the Republic. They vote upon the taxation of Massachusetts and of Michigan and of Utah and of Pennsylvania, and the Senators chosen from Oklahoma in like manner vote upon the interests of every other State in the Union, and undertake to determine what shall be the policy of the law in relation to Michigan and Utah and Massachusetts.

I am strongly opposed to the lumber interests buying the right to a vote on the floor of the United States Senate by which they can vote a tax on the people of Oklahoma who must buy lumber.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator——

Mr. LODGE. I have been listening with much interest to what the Senator has said about the point of a committee operating in two States; that it makes a sort of restriction on getting what we want to get at by this bill. The Senator has observed, of course, that the first part of the bill—that is, the bill which came from the House—reiterates that, and is drawn in conformity with existing law; that is, it is confined——

Mr. OWEN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. LODGE. It is confined to committees. But in what the Senator said it seems to me that he omitted to point out that the section proposed by the Senate no longer confines it to a committee operating in more than one State, but requires returns from candidates, which, in my judgment, is the proper way to reach the matter. It requires returns of the amounts expended by candidates for Representative in Congress and candidates for Senator; and no matter whether the money be spent in one State or in part of one State, under section 8 he has to make a return of his expenses.

Mr. OWEN. If the committee were forbidden to expend any money at all except through the candidate, then the bill as drawn being so amended, I should think it would suffice.

Mr. LODGE. The proposed amendment of the section is all right on that point, I think.

Mr. OWEN. I think so, as far as it goes.

Mr. LODGE. But, then, of course, the House bill is simply a slight enlargement of the old law.

Mr. OWEN. I think that if the committee were forbidden to spend money, and it were left solely in the hands of the candidate and his agents, and the bill so amended, it would suffice.

Mr. LODGE. If we were to require that the returns called for in the amended section 5 should be made by the candidates, as we require in the section relating to primaries, then we should get a full return, of course.

Mr. OWEN. And in that contingency we should forbid anybody else expending any money.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to see that done, but I will say to the Senator that I am anxious to see the bill passed, and I do not feel as if I at least—perhaps others may be able to do so—ought to attempt materially to change the bill which might endanger its passage here by causing long-continued delay and debate. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. OWEN. Is there anyone who will oppose such an amendment?

Mr. LODGE. I think if we were to make section 5 correspond to section 8 we should improve the bill; but I do not want to offer any amendment, because I want the bill to pass.

Mr. OWEN. I also want the bill to pass.

Mr. LODGE. We can perfect it in the future, just as we are improving and perfecting the existing law.

Mr. OWEN. I want the bill passed, and I shall not insist upon anything that would cause the defeat of what is proposed. I would rather have something than nothing, but I should like to know who it is that proposes to deny full relief. I want to know the cause, and if I can not get the cause, I should like to see who it is that will oppose by dilatory action. That is all. There is a way of ascertaining things without open confession in court.

The Senators from Pennsylvania are not the representatives of Pennsylvania alone; they are Senators of the United States, paid by the United States, and vote upon the affairs of 46 States, besides sundry Territories, and upon the affairs of millions of human beings in the islands of the sea controlled by the United States.

In my judgment, the Congress of the United States has the constitutional power to pass this act as amended.

In my judgment, it is the solemn duty of the Congress of the United States not only to pass this act as amended, but to go much further and to pass a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act as a part of this bill and to amend it to cover the deficiencies I have pointed out, that is:

First. Make it apply to all committees influencing the elections of Members of the House, whether operating in two or more States or in only one State.

Second. Make it apply to nominations as well as elections.

Third. Make it apply to Senators and presidential electors.

Fourth. Limit the amount of money to be expended and forbid in terms corrupt practice and penalize it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

No such candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall expend, or cause to be expended, a sum in the aggregate exceeding 10 cents for each voter in his district or State. No candidate shall expend more money than it is lawful to expend under the laws of the State in which he resides. No candidate for the Senate shall, directly or indirectly, contribute any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any member of the legislature of his State. No candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall promise any office or his influence or support for office to any person for the purpose of procuring the support of such person. No person guilty of violating the provisions of this act shall be seated in either the House of Representatives or the Senate, and if any person shall be seated he may be removed if found guilty of such violation: Provided, however, That no candidate for the United States Senate shall expend exceeding $5,000 and no candidate for the House of Representatives shall expend exceeding $1,500 in any campaign for nomination and election.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Missouri is very much broader than that first proposed. I notice that he has introduced an entirely new feature, namely, the provision that under certain circumstances—I do not recall the exact expression—members shall not be seated.

I ask the Senator from Missouri what he says to the constitutional provision that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Suppose we pass this law; suppose we declare that the election shall be void; that a man under such circumstances shall not be seated, and a Representative is elected in spite of these provisions of the law. The matter comes up before the House.

No court can deal with it, because the Constitution has submitted the question to the House of Representatives. The majority of the House of Representatives vote to seat the Member. What are you going to do about it? Is this a matter for legislation, or is it not a matter that must be left under the Constitution to each House to deal with separately?

Mr. REED. Beyond any doubt if this bill was passed it would be a law. Beyond any doubt if the Senate saw fit to seat a man who had violated the law there would be no power in our Government to withhold the hand of the Senate if it saw fit to do that act. But if we had such a law on the statute books to-day and men came here admitting that they had expended $107,000, or $2 a vote for every vote they got in their State, it would not take us very long, I think, to get a vote in this body to oust the gentleman who had been guilty of that sort of conduct.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask to have that provision of the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the portion of the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

No candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall promise any office or his influence or support for office to any person for the purpose of procuring the support of such person. No person guilty of violating the provisions of this act shall be seated in either the House of Representatives or the Senate, and if any person shall be seated he may be removed if found guilty of such violation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator from Missouri think that that provision if enacted would be void on its face?

Mr. REED. I do not think it is void upon its face.

Mr. BORAH. The Constitution says that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield, through the Senator from Idaho, to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. When the Senator from Idaho is through I will be glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator from California desire to address me?

Mr. WORKS. I desire to address my inquiry to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from California if the Senator from Missouri yields to him through me.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho what difference there would be in this disqualification of one elected a Member of the House, for example, and a provision of law that would disqualify him if he were under a certain age.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is a constitutional provision.

Mr. WORKS. I understand it is a constitutional provision as the Senator suggests. But while the House of Representatives may determine the qualifications of its own Members, certainly we could determine by law what those qualifications are, and it is hardly fair to presume that the House of Representatives will violate a law which is enacted by both Houses and approved by the President.

Mr. BORAH. I do not agree with the Senator from California. I contend that the House and Senate together, in other words, Congress, can not pass a law which will take it out of the power of each House, acting for itself and alone, to determine who shall sit as its Members. Each House judges of the qualifications of its Members, and we by law can not deprive each or either House of that power. We can not control it by statute. If we should pass a law adding any qualification that is not found in the Constitution itself in other provisions of it as a prerequisite to a seat, the law would be void upon its face, because it would be an attempt to take from each House the power to determine who shall sit as Members of either House, and put the power in both Houses to determine who may or who may not sit as Members of each House. There can not be any question, in my judgment, about that legal proposition.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator through?

Mr. BORAH. I am for the present.

Mr. REED. I am surprised at that objection coming from the source it does. I have understood that the Senator is a great advocate of the principle of direct elections and direct primaries now, before the Constitution is amended, and that he has been properly so, and yet every lawyer knows that the laws which exist in two or three States providing that the people shall express their choice in a primary and that the members of the legislature shall obey that primary vote have no potentiality whatever because the Constitution vests the entire control in the State legislatures. Nevertheless these laws have been passed and these laws have been found to work satisfactorily, for their moral force.

But I go further than that. While Congress alone can pass upon the election and the qualification of its Members—each House of its own Members—while that is the constitutional provision, does that mean to say that by public law we can not prescribe what the qualifications of membership shall be or the method by which a man shall arrive here?

The Constitution then comes in and undertakes to say that Congress shall have the power to decide on the qualification of the Member under the law. In other words, the Constitution, instead of allowing a court to determine who shall sit in this body, said that this body should be its own court, and should decide the question itself. But that is to decide the question of fact. Does that deprive Congress of the power to legislate at all with reference to how men shall come here—how their elections shall be held? I think not. We have already gone into that ground. We have already passed——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I want to finish my sentence. Then I will yield, of course.

We have already passed many laws relating to elections for Congressmen; we have already passed laws relating to many matters of that kind, and when a man comes to Congress, Congress does judge of his election and of his qualifications. Congress is presumed to obey that public law of the land. If it does not obey it, then the law simply is rendered nugatory, a thing it is not to be presumed Congress will do.

So whatever law we pass in this land may be rendered null and void by the courts if they refuse to enforce it. But we do not presume the courts will do that.

Now, I put it to the Senator in all candor and in all fairness: Does he believe, first, that Congress has no power to provide how an election shall be held——

Mr. BORAH. I will answer that.

Mr. REED. To limit the expenditure of candidates; and if he does believe that—I put the second question—whether the enactment of such a law as this—placing a limit—would not have a good moral effect at least? And then I put a third question to him: If Congress can not limit the expenses, certainly a legislative body could not limit the expenses of a Member of this Senate and make it valid and binding and compel the Senate to obey it? Would it not be true, then, that our country is in the unfortunate situation where neither the Federal legislative authorities nor the State legislative authorities can protect the elections of Senators from the abuse of money?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether I can remember the several questions, but I think I can answer them all by answering the first.

Section 5 of the Constitution, Article I, provides that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum, etc.

Now, the Senator says that Congress may do so and so with reference to the election, providing against the use of money, and such matters.

I agree with that proposition, and if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri went no further than that I would not raise the objection I have raised from a legal standpoint.

But the Senator from Missouri goes further, and I think upon a moment's reflection he will see that he goes too far, because by law he undertakes to say that certain disqualifications shall unseat a Member of the lower House of Congress, for instance. We can not do that. We can provide for the manner and the method of elections and we can go a certain distance with reference to prescribing what the parties shall file or what they shall not, or what showing they shall make when they come here for the purpose of asking for a seat.

But, Mr. President, when those things are presented and when those facts are before this body, this body alone will say whether or not it unseats him or disqualifies him for this position, and the House of Representatives alone will say whether its Member is entitled to a seat or is disqualified.

We can not as a joint body, we can not as Congress, say that a man having spent $100,000 shall not have a seat in the lower House of Congress. We can say that, upon having expended that amount, he must file his certificate with the proper officer, and then the House itself may say whether or not that shall unseat him.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have great respect for the opinions of the Senator from Idaho on questions of law, particularly as to the construction of the Constitution. But I think he is absolutely and entirely wrong on this proposition. Undoubtedly, as he says, each House must determine the qualifications of its Members. That is to say, the power to determine the question of qualifications is placed in the two bodies. But that does not prevent the Congress of the United States from determining in advance what those qualifications are——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. Just one moment—except where the provision conflicts with the Constitution, as I think this does not.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, doubtless the provision of the Constitution to which I shall refer has already been called to the attention of the Senate in this connection. But I will read it.

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years, and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The rule is that when the Constitution prescribes the qualifications for office the mention of those qualifications is exclusive of all others, and they can not be added to or subtracted from by legislative enactment. That is the point to which I invite the attention of the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I was about to refer to a similar provision with respect to Members of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Texas will observe that these provisions are negative in their character——

Mr. OWEN. Sure.

Mr. WORKS. That no one shall be a Senator except he has certain qualifications; but it does not provide that there may not be other limitations of his rights to serve, by any means.

Mr. CULBERSON. Except by implication, and the mention affirmatively of the qualifications in the Constitution is exclusive of all others. That is the uniform rule both in the construction of statutory law and constitutional law, I think.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly so, if the provision is an affirmative one, that the party having certain qualifications shall be entitled to hold the office. But that is not the provision here. It is not an affirmative provision. It simply negatives the right under certain conditions, and there may be other qualifications added without infringing upon the provisions of the Constitution at all.

The provision with respect to Representatives is that—

> No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of 25 years and been 7 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Now, undoubtedly there could be no provision which could conflict with those negative provisions, but there is nothing in the Constitution which prevents the Congress of the United States from imposing a disqualification such as is now proposed in addition to those provided by the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from California yield?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from California, suppose we should pass an act of Congress, a law, providing that a Member should not be entitled to a seat in either House of Congress, or he should be disqualified if it should be ascertained he had expended $100,000 in his election. Then we would have fixed a disqualification which would deny him a seat, which would make it impossible for him to take his seat——

Mr. WORKS. If the House of Representatives determined that that disqualification existed. It would be left to it to determine that question.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator from California and I do not disagree at all. What I have been contending for all the time is that the House and the Senate each must determine for itself what that disqualification shall be——

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. And whether or not it exists.

Mr. OWEN. Under the law.

Mr. BORAH. Not under the law. The law can not erect a standard or fix a disqualification binding upon either branch of Congress. Each House may seat or unseat, regardless of any such law. Each House is the sole judge of the qualification of its Members, and Congress can not take away that power.

Mr. WORKS. There can be no question that the House determines the question of disqualification, but if the Congress of the United States determines it is a disqualification, then it is the duty of the House to declare it when it comes to investigate the question. We can not pass a law here which would prevent a Member taking his seat in the House of Representatives, but Congress may pass an act by which the House of Representatives should be guided in determining that question.

Mr. BORAH. It would only be persuasive. It would only have a moral effect. It would not have any binding legal effect. In other words, if the House saw fit to seat the man, the law would not unseat him.

Mr. WORKS. That would be conclusive, because it is made the sole judge of that. But the Senator is assuming that the House of Representatives would violate the law by admitting him.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator and I do not disagree. My contention is that each House must determine at last for itself. I do not think the Senator from California and I disagree.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wanted to say a word in connection with what was said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who I think laid down the correct rule, that these qualifications, as stated in the Constitution, whether stated negatively or not, are conclusive. I do not now recall the case, but I am very sure there is a case where an attempt was made by one of the States to require residence of a Representative in the district from which he was chosen. It was held that the Constitution required only residence in the State, and that qualification could not be extended or added to.

I think there is a direct case on that point, that the State—in that case it was a State—could not add to the qualifications. I think it was stated broadly that no qualification of that sort could be added.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to a statement, which bears out what he has just said, in Willoughby on the Constitution, page 526, which reads:

> It is plain that no State may add qualifications to those required by the Constitution of Members of Congress. Thus in 1856 the governor of a State having refused to issue credentials to the rival claimants because they were disqualified under provisions of the State constitution to membership in the House, the House seated the one shown prima facie by official statement to have a majority of votes. Similar action was taken by the Senate the same year.

He refers to Hinds' Precedents and to Story's Commentaries as authority.

Mr. WORKS. The case cited by the Senator from Massachusetts is in no sense a parallel case. There was an attempt to change the direct qualification provided in the Constitution as to residence, and it would, therefore, come directly in conflict with the Constitution.

Mr. OWEN. Section 5 provides that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications.

Judge means one thing and authority to predetermine what the qualifications are is another thing.

If the constitutional provision providing for the age and residence should be violated it might be held void, of course, but, as the Senator from California well pointed out, those provisions are negative. You may not pass a law which would change the age fixed by the Constitution. But there is not only nothing in the Constitution to prevent other qualifications being added by law, but there is in the Constitution, outside of the warrant of common sense, a plain warrant which provides that the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations relating to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. This is now proposed to be a change in the manner of elections and proposing to impose a suitable penalty. It is authorized by the Constitution and is not denied by the Constitution.

The House of Representatives may judge the qualifications under the law, but the House of Representatives can not pass a law by itself to fix the qualifications of Members or to change it, except in the manner provided for the making of the laws of the United States by act of the House and Senate, with the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I want to read just a paragraph from Mr. Willoughby on the Constitution, which is also supported by a paragraph from Mr. Story, which I will not take time to read:

> Though essentially a judicial function, the conclusive determination as to whether the constitutional qualifications for membership have been met is, by the Constitution, placed in the hands of each of the two Houses of Congress. It thus happens that though neither House may formally impose qualifications additional to those mentioned in the Constitution or waive those that are mentioned, each may in practice do either of these things.

In other words, both Houses together can not add any qualifications other than those which are found in the Constitution. Each House may, in the exercise of its power to determine who shall be a Member of it, add any qualification it sees fit—that is, may judge—and there is no power to review its judgment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to weary the Senate by repeating the argument on this question. In view of this language of the Constitution—

> No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of 30 years and been 9 years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen—

No one will claim that a State legislature or that Congress could provide that a man must be admitted who was 29 years of age. That would be in the face of that section.

But the question is this: Does that language providing the qualifications of the Members bar both Congress and the States from adding any other qualifications? I think it will hardly be contended that it goes to the extent of barring Congress from legislating with reference at least to the manner of election.

What is sought to be done here is to provide a manner or a method or a portion of the manner by which a Senator can be elected.

We might turn this measure around and say that no candidate for the Senate shall proceed in any other or different manner than this and prescribe certain rules. What we are trying to do is to map out the rule and point the path which must be traveled by every man who comes to this Senate; and I think we find the warrant for that in the language that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] quoted:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

When, therefore, we say, as I am insisting we should say by this amendment, that no candidate in seeking to be elected shall expend more than certain sums of money, when the bill amended by the committee undertakes to say that certain things shall not be done, we are simply undertaking to regulate the manner of the election; and if that which is sought to be done by the amendment can not be done because of the Constitution, then no thing that is sought to be done by the committee amendments or by the bill itself can be done under the Constitution. All these provisions are in the same boat, and they must go over the same constitutional Niagara at the same moment of time, for if the Constitution inhibits and bars one, it bars them all.

Now, will any Senator claim that we could not pass a public statute? I ask the Senator from Idaho—I am appealing to his candor, and I have the utmost respect for his ability as a lawyer—would the Senator claim that we could not pass a law which would provide that any man who was guilty of bribery and the buying of his way into the Senate should be guilty of a felony and upon conviction of that felony that he should be sent to the penitentiary?

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. REED. In just a moment. You say that is not regulating the election, that is punishing an act. Will the Senator say that you could not add to that "and such person shall be disqualified to sit in the Senate of the United States"? I think it is drawing the line pretty strong to say that could not be added as a penalty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have not drawn the line. I am simply reading the Constitution, which drew the line before I reached the arena of action. The Constitution reserves that judging power to another tribunal and places it in that body alone; not in this body and the other body acting jointly under the law, but each acting for itself and exercising its judgment whenever the matter comes before it.

The only effect of such a law, if you would call a void act a law, would be simply its persuasive force or its moral force. I have no doubt as a matter of law but what if Congress should pass an act saying that a man who spent money in a certain way should be guilty of felony, and added thereto that he should also be denied his seat—that as matter of law it would be void?

Mr. REED. Would not a court have the right to add that as a part of the judgment?

Mr. BORAH. If the court should enter judgment that a man should not sit in this body under certain conditions, we would not be under constitutional obligations to pay any attention to the judgment whatever. The courts can not determine who shall sit in this body; and the Congress of the United States can not make a law conferring jurisdiction upon the courts to determine who shall sit here.

Mr. REED. The Senator and I are in agreement on that.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that, if Congress has a right to pass an act declaring a certain course of conduct to be a felony on the part of a candidate, the candidate, being guilty, would be barred from his seat on the floor of the House of Representatives as having been guilty of a felony; and having therefore violated the law which Congress has the constitutional right to pass, it removes him from the House. So the very instance proposed by the Senator would serve to show that Congress has the power to remove him from within the qualified list.

Mr. BORAH. Permit me to ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question.

Mr. REED. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose all the Senator says has taken place and he has been convicted of a crime, but suppose the House of Representatives should say that in its judgment it will not unseat him; that he is entitled to sit; how would we review their act and how would we get him out?

Mr. OWEN. We would not review it at all. They are the judges of his qualifications, but it is not to be presumed that the House of Representatives will fail to judge properly and truly the cases brought before them.

Mr. BORAH. That is a pure matter of the moral effect of the so-called law, but as a legal proposition, suppose the House should say that, notwithstanding this verdict of the jury, we do not think this man is guilty of corruption and we will not exclude him, would the Senator from Oklahoma review that action?

Mr. OWEN. The action would not be reviewable.

Mr. BORAH. You would have to go back to the constituency and review it in another election, and, as has been many times said, that is the only way you can review it.

Mr. OWEN. That does not at all affect the real proposition.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho what would be the effect of the House of Representatives determining that an applicant was qualified for a seat when he was under the age provided by the Constitution? Would there be any remedy?

Mr. BORAH. There would not be any remedy as far as we are concerned.

Mr. WORKS. As far as anybody is concerned?

Mr. BORAH. That is exactly the contention which I have been making, that the House is the sole judge and the Senate is the sole judge of the qualifications and the election of its Members.

Mr. WORKS. Then there is no difference between myself and the Senator from Idaho, that the House of Representatives or the Senate in any case is the sole judge of the qualifications, but it is fair to presume that if the qualifications were imposed the House of Representatives would rightly decide.

Mr. BORAH. With respect to those qualifications they might not, but even if they decided wrongly their decision would be conclusive.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. In hearing the proposed amendment of the Senator from Missouri read from the desk I understood it to provide that in a certain contingency not mentioned in the Constitution of the United States the person should be excluded from the right to a seat in the Senate. I expressed the opinion offhand that the mention of the qualification of a Senator in the Constitution thereby excluded the Congress from adding to or subtracting from the qualifications mentioned in the Constitution. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON (continuing). I will read from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations the rule, as I announced it from recollection:

> Another rule of construction is that when the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition or to extend the penalty to other cases. On this ground it has been held by the supreme court of Maryland that where the Constitution defines the qualifications of an officer it is not in the power of the legislature to change or superadd to them unless the power to do so is expressly or by necessary implication conferred by the Constitution itself. Other cases recognizing the same principle are referred to in the note.

Among which cases is the St. Joseph, and so forth, Railroad Co. v. Buchanan County Court, Thirty-ninth Missouri, page 485.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the very distinguished Senator from Texas has read us some law that nobody disputes. No one claims that we can change the Constitution with reference to the qualification of a Member. What is contended for here is that Congress does have the right to provide the time and the place and the manner of electing Senators, and having that right it has the right to provide that an election shall be held in a certain way, and that the men who are running for office shall proceed in a certain way, and under that authority we can limit the amount of money that is used in a general campaign for purposes that would not be felonious, just the same as we could provide by law that no man should be seated in the Senate of the United States or in Congress who had procured his seat by bribery.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] undertakes to meet that objection by saying that if we pass such a law and the House of Representatives does not enforce it, but sees fit to seat the Member, there is no appeal from that action. That is true. If the House of Representatives or the Senate refuse to obey any law there is no power on earth that will make either body obey the law. But because the House is the judge of its own Members, because it is the judicial tribunal in which the question is settled, it does not mean to say that it is not bound in its decision as a matter of law and as a matter of conscience to obey a law which has been passed.

It is true if we do not obey it nobody can send us to jail for it, nobody can commit the Senate, and nobody can appeal from the action of the Senate; but it is equally true that if any legal question comes before the Supreme Court of the United States and it happens to decide it wrong, that is an end of the matter, there is no appeal from it. It is true to-day that if the Senate saw fit to seat a man here who was 21 years of age, there is no power on earth which could interfere with that gentleman occupying the seat, because the Constitution has reserved to this body the right to decide. When the distinguished Senator from Idaho argues that because we can not appeal from the Senate, therefore we have no right to pass the law, he might just as well argue against the constitutional provision for a wise, a prudent, or a proper measure, because if the Senate does not obey the Constitution there is no power to make it obey it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. The question, therefore, is not to be determined by whether there is any power to compel the Senate to obey a law or not; but the question comes back to us, Do we have any power to prescribe the conditions upon which a man shall arrive here? Does the Senator maintain that we can not pass a valid and binding law providing that no man shall be guilty of bribery in order to secure a seat in Congress?

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand the question of the Senator.

Mr. REED. I say, would the Senator claim that we could not pass a law providing that no man should be guilty of bribery in order to secure a seat in Congress? Have we the power to pass it?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; no doubt——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I maintain that we could not pass a law which would say that a man who had been guilty of bribery should not be seated in this Chamber. The Senate will determine for itself when a man shall be seated and when he shall not be seated.

Mr. REED. In other words, then, the difference between the Senator from Idaho and myself is this: He does not object to limiting the amount of money which shall be expended and saying that a man shall not expend more than that, but he maintains that we ought to stop at that point and leave it to the Senate to say on its own motion whether or not it will seat him.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, Mr. President, the difference between the Senator and myself is as to what constitutes a legal enactment. The Senator thinks that we can go so far as to say that when a party has spent so much money he can thereby be deprived of his seat here. If I thought we could do that I would not have any objection at all. But if it turns out that we have not the power to say he shall be seated then our act would be futile and we would not have accomplished what the Senator desires to accomplish. What I say is that we can require a Member of the House of Representatives—or I had better say of the Senate—to file a certificate disclosing the amount of money which has been expended; but we can not add that he shall be disqualified from holding a seat in either branch by reason of that fact, because that judgment is reserved for another tribunal. We must abide by the judgment of either House when the facts are before either House as to the violation or compliance with the law.

The Senator referred to the fact that I said if the House of Representatives and the Senate should not see fit to obey the law—but, Mr. President, we differ right there. I claim it is not a law; that being in conflict with the terms of the Constitution it never becomes a law; that it is void from the beginning, and it is not a violation of the law at all.

Mr. REED. What constitutional provision does it violate?

Mr. BORAH. That each House shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own Members. It does not say both Houses shall be the judges of the qualifications of its Members, and when we fix a qualification which unseats a Member we make the Houses jointly the judges of the qualifications of the Members of each House.

Mr. REED. Would that not also be true of that provision of the Constitution which provides the age? Would you say that because one section of the Constitution provides the age of a Senator that that section is in conflict with the section which gives to the Senate the right to determine the qualifications of its Member?

Mr. BORAH. The provision to which the Senator is now referring is in the Constitution itself.

Mr. REED. It is in the Constitution itself, and it certainly does not conflict. There is one provision of the Constitution which declares that a man must be 30 years of age. Here is another provision of the Constitution which makes the Senate the judge of the qualifications of its own Members. Those two are not inconsistent. The second provision simply means that the Senate shall judge as to the facts under the provision as to whether the man has arrived at the age of 30 years. If the Senate does not judge it right, of course that is the end of it; there is no appeal. But that is a provision that is put in here in order to protect the legislative branch of the Government and preserve its independence from all other branches.

If the Senate can unseat a man who comes here and who has paid bribe money to secure his place here, then it is under its general power, it is true, to judge of his qualifications. There is no such provision in the Constitution. Yet the Senate has always exercised the right to oust a man who comes here wrongfully; and I can not understand why, if Congress has the right to make laws providing for the time, manner, and place of an election of Senators, it can not prescribe as a part of that manner that money shall not be used, and can not provide further, by the action of both bodies, that the man shall not be entitled to his seat. But that still allows the Senate to decide the question of fact as to whether he shall sit here or not, and from that there is no appeal.

Mr. President, I have prolonged this controversy far beyond my intention and I ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. SUTHERLAND addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I make the point of order that when a Senator calls for the yeas and nays and another Senator addresses the Chair for the purpose of continuing the debate, the demand for the yeas and nays can not be entertained.

Mr. REED. I withdraw it.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, so that the RECORD may be right, I simply apologize for taking so much time, and I really meant to notify the Senate that when we voted I wanted a yea-and-nay vote. I did not, however, have the slightest thought of cutting off any Senator who wanted the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the circumstances, the Senator's request would not have cut off any Senator who desired to speak.

Mr. REED. I was not trying to do so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I call for the reading of the proposed amendment or for the reading of that portion of it referring to the exercise of influence in the election of members of the legislature. There is something of that sort in the amendment, and I want to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the portion of the amendment to which the Senator from South Dakota refers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the whole amendment be read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the entire amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following words:

No such candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall expend, or cause to be expended, a sum in the aggregate exceeding 10 cents for each voter in his district or State. No candidate shall expend more money than it is lawful to expend under the laws of the State in which he resides. No candidate for the Senate shall, directly or indirectly, contribute any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any member of the legislature of his State. No candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall promise any office or his influence or support for office to any person for the purpose of procuring the support of such person. No person guilty of violating the provisions of this act shall be seated in either the House of Representatives or the Senate, and if any person shall be seated, he may be removed if found guilty of such violation. Provided, however, No candidate for the United States Senate shall expend exceeding $5,000 and no candidate for the House of Representatives shall expend exceeding $1,500 in any campaign for nomination and election.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the amount named in the amendment is very small, and that, if he would consent to it, I believe it would be better if he would put the amount permitted to be expended by a Senator at $10,000 and by a Member of the House of Representatives at $5,000.

Mr. REED. I think that is pretty large; but I would rather have it $10,000 and $5,000, respectively, and have the amendment supported than to have no limit at all, as the present bill proposes; and if that is the desire I shall accept the suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment in the manner which will now be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the last proviso in the amendment, so that it will read:

Provided, however, No candidate for the United States Senate shall expend exceeding $10,000 and no candidate for the House of Representatives shall expend exceeding $5,000 in any campaign for nomination and election.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there was a little discussion about this matter some weeks ago, and in it I expressed the opinion that, as the primary election in some States amounted to an election, the same reasoning which made it important that there should be publicity as to regular elections would naturally apply to primary elections. I still adhere to that opinion. There is one consideration, however, Mr. President, which is a very serious one to my mind, and that is, were the amendment to be adopted, one who fails to comply with the requirements of its provisions will be subject to the penalties prescribed in the original act. It gives the Federal courts the jurisdiction to try any violation of the provisions of this amendment, with penalties of fine and imprisonment in the penitentiary. I do not mean to say that I think the violator of this law should go free of punishment, or that the violator of this proposed amendment should go free of punishment, but I myself am unwilling that the Federal courts should have the greatly and the immensely enlarged criminal jurisdiction which would necessarily follow for any violation in any of the almost innumerable primary elections which would be affected by this proposed law, in any of which the violation of the law would give to the Federal court a criminal jurisdiction. I can not bring myself to the point of consenting that there shall be in the administration of this law the immense increase and extent of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in the punishment of the alleged offenses specified in this provision.

I think there ought to be publicity as to expenses in primary elections; I am ready to go further and say that there ought to be a way to enforce the making of such publication as may be required of such expenses, but I think that that had better be left to the States. In my own State we now have such a law. Every candidate for Congress, every candidate for the Senate, every candidate for the legislature, every candidate for governor, is required under the law of my State to make the publication which is here proposed to be required. While there may be some reasons why it would be desirable that the matter should be under the control of the Federal Government, I think the consequences of that would be too far-reaching; and I am not myself willing to vote, and can not vote, for this amendment unless the amendment is still further amended to the effect that the criminal jurisdiction of the Federal courts shall not be extended to apply to cases of that kind.

It may be said that a law which can not be enforced would be of no avail, but there are beneficial results that would flow from the enactment of the law even in the absence of the criminal feature. If publicity were required, of course the man who would deliberately violate it would necessarily place himself at a disadvantage; and the fact that there is such a requirement would make men careful in the use of money and confine them to its proper use, knowing that there must be publicity of it, or such a refusal to make publicity as would necessarily impute to the candidate a failure not only to comply with the law, but the consciousness of imputation of the violation of the law.

But however that may be, whether that would be a sufficient safeguard or not in the absence of a direct criminal penalty to be inflicted by a judgment of a Federal court, I am unwilling to extend the Federal criminal jurisdiction to that extent. It would be very wide; it would reach into almost every nook and corner of every judicial district. The great trouble is not simply that it would extend the Federal criminal jurisdiction—to which I am opposed, for I do not think the Federal Government was organized with a view to having an extension of criminal jurisdiction of its courts to be exercised with regard to the citizen—but it puts an immense power in the hands of any irresponsible party to institute criminal proceedings in the Federal courts upon allegations of what occurred during an election, because the amendment as reported by the committee is not confined to the manner of the publication of expenses, but it extends to the smallest promise that any man has made to another while he was a candidate as to what he would do for him in case he should be elected. It opens too wide a door to the entire irresponsible class of any community to put men in a position where, however innocent they may be, there will be very great hardship and very great embarrassment and very great injustice.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I believe that the expenses of a primary election should be made public, I prefer that it should remain as it is in my own State, where now we have such a law, which is observed, rather than that there should be such a change in the law as would give this very wide increase to the criminal jurisdiction of the Federal courts and put in the hands of irresponsible and improper persons the opportunity to avenge themselves, if you please, or to do injustice, or even, in some instances, to go still further, perhaps, and to attempt to levy blackmail. I think that the possibilities under it are entirely too serious to justify the support of the amendment if the criminal jurisdiction is attached.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, do I understand that the amendment conferring jurisdiction on the Federal Government or asserting its jurisdiction with respect to primary elections has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment as amended has been agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, Mr. President, I want a roll call on that amendment. I agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in the opinion that this is a wholesome and proper provision of law if adopted by the proper jurisdiction. If we were members of a State legislature I should vote for the amendment, and I would not only vote for it, but I would vote for the amendments proposed a moment ago by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; but under my conviction that the General Government under its authority to regulate elections has no power to regulate a primary election, I am compelled to vote against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas, then, objects to the amendment being agreed to by unanimous consent?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And asks for a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. BAILEY. I will not ask for a roll call, Mr. President, but I will ask that the amendment as amended be submitted to a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. REED. Will that put the bill beyond amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it can be further amended. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to offer a further amendment?

Mr. REED. I do, Mr. President. I have not had the time to write it, but I can state it literally, so that the reporter will get it exactly. I desire to offer the same amendment I did before, with the following lines stricken out:

No person guilty of violating the provisions of this act shall be seated in either the House of Representatives or the Senate; and if any person shall be seated, he may be removed if found guilty of such violation.

It simply leaves the prohibitive clauses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator will send the amendment to the desk, the Secretary will state it.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand that is offered as an amendment to the amendment or an amendment to the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a new amendment, to come in at the end of the bill, as the Chair now understands. The Chair understood, when the Senator from Missouri asked recognition, that he desired to present an amendment to the amendment.

The Chair thinks the vote should be first taken upon the amendment of the committee as amended. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri would follow the disposition of the amendment as amended. It does not amend it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended. By the sound, the "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. LODGE. What is the question?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think we clearly understood what we were voting on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. BACON. If that is the question, I would be glad if the Chair would have the Secretary state what is the amendment which has been agreed to to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment has been agreed to, and now the question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended. Does the Senator from Georgia ask what is the amendment that has been agreed to to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. BACON. I should like to have it stated before the bill is finally passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, did not the Senator from Missouri just offer an amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was an amendment to the bill, not to the amendment of the committee. That will come in after the pending question is disposed of. The Secretary will report the amendment which has been already agreed to to the amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. The Senate has agreed to an amendment to the proposed committee amendment as follows:

On page 7, line 8, after the word "knowledge," insert a comma and the words "or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only amendment to the amendment which has been agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand that the amendment that is found in italics on pages 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment as amended by the amendment which the Secretary has just read is what the Senate is now about to vote upon.

Mr. BACON. The amendment to the amendment has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment has been agreed to, and the Senate is now asked to vote upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. LODGE. The amended committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment as amended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Upon that, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence I will withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. If he were present, I would vote "yea." I am not certain how he would vote on this particular amendment, but he being absent, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I will withhold my vote. But if I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. CURTIS's name was called). The Senator from Kansas desired me to announce that he was called away from the Chamber on business connected with the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRYAN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). My colleague is absent from the Senate, engaged in the Lorimer investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. JONES's name was called). The senior Senator from Washington is detained on the Lorimer investigation and is therefore necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CUMMINS (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). My colleague is unavoidably absent. He has authorized me to say that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. He not being present and I having no information as to how he would vote on the question, I will withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). The junior Senator from Washington is unavoidably detained. He is paired, however, with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I transfer that to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS]. I am not advised how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I should like to announce that I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I do not know how he would vote upon this matter, and I expect it will be better for me not to vote. If I were not paired I would vote "nay" upon the amendment.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAYNTER. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE. I am paired with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If he were present and I were privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. By arrangement with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], we have transferred those pairs so that each of us may vote. My vote has already been cast and will stand.

Mr. GAMBLE. I am informed that the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has not voted, and I will transfer the pair of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] to the senior Senator from Washington and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If present, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the negative). I announced a moment ago that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and that I transferred it to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] and voted. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], I was informed, was not present. He is now present, and I announce my pair and withdraw my vote, so as to allow him to vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I find, on consulting the agreement that the junior Senator from New York and I had with reference to a pair, that we are both on the same side of this question, and that being so, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—50.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Senate will state.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following:

No such candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall expend, or cause to be expended, a sum in the aggregate exceeding 10 cents for each voter in his district or State. No candidate shall expend more money than it is lawful to expend under the laws of the State in which he resides. No candidate for the Senate shall directly or indirectly contribute any money or thing of value to assist in procuring the nomination or election of any member of the legislature of his State. No candidate for the Senate or House of Representatives shall promise any office, or his influence or support for office, to any person for the purpose of procuring the support of such person: Provided, however, No candidate for the United States Senate shall expend exceeding $10,000 and no candidate for the House of Representatives shall expend exceeding $5,000 in any campaign for nomination and election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already stated that I am in entire sympathy with the principle involved in this amendment. The only difficulty is to draft an amendment which will properly cover the ground. So far as I am able to do so I will accept it as suggested by the Senator and will undertake to deal with it in conference and see if we can redraft it so as to cover the principle involved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. Add after the amendment just agreed to the following:

Provided further, That the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office, directed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives or to the Secretary of the Senate, as the case may be, and duly stamped and registered within the time required herein, shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under any of the provisions of this act.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That amendment should come in, not after the amendment which has just been adopted, but at the end of the present bill, after the words "District of Columbia," on page 8, line 8.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be understood that the amendment will be inserted at that point.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Inserted there, I think the amendment is entirely proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to present an amendment. It is to be section 1 of the bill, so as to read, "That sections 1, 5, 6, and 8 shall read," and so forth. It amends section 1 of the original act to read as follows:

That the term "political committee" under the provisions of this act shall include the national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties and all committees, associations, or organizations which shall in one or more States influence the result or attempt to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress or Senators of the United States are to be elected.

The purpose of that is to enlarge the act to apply to committees in States and not to confine it to those in two or more States. It provides also that it shall apply to the election of Senators as well as Members of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "sections," insert "one," with a comma following it; and on page 1, after line 8, insert:

That the term "political committee" under the provisions of this act shall include the national committees of all political parties and the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties and all committees, associations, or organizations which shall in one or more States influence the result or attempt to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress or Senators of United States are to be elected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As I understand the amendment suggested, it is a part of the original act not attempted in any manner to be covered by the pending bill, and it undertakes to add to existing law a provision bringing the State committees under the jurisdiction of Congress.

The State committees are concerned in the election of the various State officers, the governor of the State, the secretary of state, and the other State officers. They are purely voluntary oganizations.

While I have not a fixed opinion on the subject, it occurs to me that the power of Congress to deal with such a committee is extremely doubtful.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think the Senator from Utah understood the language of the proposed amendment. It does not say "State committee," but it says committees attempting to influence the election of Senators or Members of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It goes farther, then, than I thought. It would include county committees and district committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" have it.

Mr. OWEN. I ask for a vote by yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand seconded? [After counting.] Nine Senators have seconded the demand. The yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us have the other side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows of no proceeding in the Senate by which that can be done.

Mr. BAILEY. It might be that when the other side held up their hands it would develop that there was not a quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the Chair has never known that proceeding to be followed.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Texas will pardon me a minute, before the Chair announced that the demand had not been seconded but after he counted those on this side, I raised my hand, which made 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Even that would be insufficient. The last vote was 57.

Mr. BACON. That is more than the fifth of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Constitution does not require the fifth of a quorum, but one-fifth of those present. The last vote was 57.

Mr. BACON. I respectfully submit that does not indicate——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will be glad to put the question again.

Mr. OWEN. Before the question is put again, I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Culberson	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Bailey	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Borah	Dillingham	Myers	Stone
Bourne	Dixon	Nelson	Sutherland
Bradley	Foster	Newlands	Swanson
Brandegee	Gamble	Overman	Taylor
Bristow	Gore	Owen	Thornton
Brown	Gronna	Page	Townsend
Bryan	Heyburn	Paynter	Warren
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Watson
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Jones	Reed	Williams
Chilton	La Follette	Root	Works
Clapp	Lippitt	Shively
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Simmons
Crawford	McCumber	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Oklahoma asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded? [After counting.] Eleven Senators have raised their hands; not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused. The amendment is lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to suggest an amendment to the title of the bill, but I presume that should be done after the bill is passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title should be amended after the bill is passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am confronted with rather an unpleasant situation. This is not the first time I have been confronted with a proposition on which I am to decide between what I should like to do and what I think we may do. I do not believe that Congress has any power over political committees, the personnel of which may change every hour, and for which there is no legal manner provided for the appointment or selection. Congress can not say that a committee shall exist, and if Congress can not say that a committee shall exist, and if no other law can say that men in the exercise of their individual rights as citizens in the selection of candidates for office may not organize committees, or disorganize them in a minute, then Congres can not act so as to control the action of committees.

However desirable it may be to legislate upon this subject had we the power, the first question is, Have we the power? It is proposed here that Congress shall reach out its hand and determine the action of an organization or body of men that is not contemplated by law. It can not determine the size of the committee and it can not determine its membership, or that one shall exist at all. Thus I can not bring my mind to legislating upon a subject so entirely outside of the powers.

Then again, Mr. President, on page 5 of the bill as it is now amended, in line 12, it reads:

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination—

Now, a nomination is not an election. There are times when doubtless the nominee would like it to be equivalent to an election, but it is not, nevertheless.

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or for indorsement at any general election.

There is no such situation existing to-day either in contemplation of law or at all. There may be some States that have that kind of freak legislation, but it is not recognized as a part of any existing law, because the Constitution says that the elections of Senators shall be by the legislature, not by nomination, not at primary elections. Of course I presume that this was originally drawn by some who favored the amendment to the Constitution and in their zeal overlooked the fact that the amendment had not been adopted.

I can not vote on the assumption that Congress has power in any manner to control or direct that which does not exist or that which may exist perhaps in isolated cases but is not of general application.

Then again, on line 17, the words "primary election" occur. Congress does not recognize primary elections. The Constitution does not recognize primary elections. They exist by virtue of the laws of a State. Congress could not under any circumstances provide for a primary election in a State. Congress does not pay the expenses of a primary election nor provide for or control the payment of the expenses of a primary election. They are purely a matter of local government.

Then on line 18 it provides for the filing of a statement "at which he is seeking indorsement." That is going a long ways. There is no recognized or definite method by which a man may seek an indorsement. That goes away beyond the man who seeks to prevail in a primary election. An indorsement has no recognized existence under any law, even the law of a State, and we could not take notice of that, and it is, of course, not general.

I am pointing these out as purely legal objections to me that I can not waive.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the learned Senator if he does not think this law is made to apply to primary elections owing to the possibility that we will be confronted by certain conditions arising in the future?

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator think we ought to amend it and make it apply to an election that will occur under the initiative and referendum and recall?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator from Georgia is thoroughly acquainted with my views in regard to that kind of a procedure.

Mr. BACON. I was asking the Senator in good faith.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand.

Mr. BACON. If it is made to apply to such a thing as a primary election, ought it not to be made also to apply to any election which may occur under the initiative, referendum, and recall?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think it is desirable or necessary to emphasize a wrong or to amend legislation proposing to do that which we have no power to do. It is better to strike right at the act itself.

At which he is seeking indorsement.

This, of course, relates to the primary election. He is seeking indorsement. That is not an election.

I am referring now only to the provisions of the bill as they relate to the United States Senate. The Constitution provides that a Senator shall be elected by the legislature. It does not give authority to Congress to provide how a legislature may be elected. It might be appointed. The constitution of the State deals with that question, not the Constitution of the United States. Suppose we enact legislation here that is entirely antagonistic to the legislation of the State upon the same subject over which the State has undoubted jurisdiction; it does not appeal to me as a legal proposition.

Then, again, on page 6, it is stated that—

Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election, for indorsement or election at any general election, or for election by the legislature of any State, shall, within 15 days after any such primary election, and within 15 days after any such general election—

file certain statements. What would be the result in a State where they have no primary elections? We would have one rule in one jurisdiction and another rule in another jurisdiction. There are many States where they have no primaries, where members of the legislature are nominated at a convention of the county or district and elected throughout the State. Members of the legislature are not State officers; they are county and district officers. Have Senators thought of that? They are not State officers, but county and district officers. Does anybody challenge the proposition? Is Congress going to exercise control over the election of county officers? I would hardly think so.

Then turn to page 7, line 12, leading up to it in regard to making pledges. It provides that the candidate for the United States Senate shall not make any pledges "for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation." Well, there is no such thing recognized by law as a candidate for the United States Senate. The law does not deal with candidates in providing for the election of a Senator. A man need not be a candidate. A man may be elected upon ballot whose name had not been mentioned or thought of a moment before the ballot was taken. Can he be said to be a candidate? Many men are elected to the Senate who are not candidates. Can you put a burden upon a man thus elected and say that he shall file a statement five days before when he is not then a candidate and does not know that he will be voted for or receive a vote?

Then again, many men are candidates who do not receive a single vote in the legislature. I have known of such a case. Can that man file a statement five days before and so many days afterwards who did not receive a vote, when the only person who knew or suspected him of being a candidate was the man himself? In other words, this measure goes far beyond any possible power that Congress can have.

If we have not the power, will we legislate upon it without power? Does not the responsibility resting upon Senators appeal to them not to attempt legislation beyond their powers? I do not believe that they would have the power under the Constitution as it exists, and I know they would not have it under the Constitution as it is proposed to amend it, because the provision as to section 4 of Article I of the Constitution proposes to repeal the law under which you are proposing to enact this measure. If section 4 is to be repealed, if I may use the word "repealed" with reference to the elimination of a provision from the Constitution, then under what power would Congress deal with the question at all? The proposed amendment of the Constitution leaves it entirely to the States to provide for the time and manner of the election of Senators. So you can get no comfort there out of the Constitution as it is proposed to amend it or out of the Constitution as it is now, and I hope it never will be amended. It looks as if it would not.

On page 8, in lines 2 and 3, we find this expression in regard to the filing of statements:

and shall be sworn to by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative, or the State in which he is a candidate for Senator, in the Congress of the United States.

No law, either State or Federal, recognizes canvassing for Senators. There is no such thing in the contemplation of law as being a candidate for Senator. In the days when we had conventions everywhere, a man might be a candidate by reason of the action of the convention, but we have no such condition now, and a man can not be a candidate for the United States Senate at a primary, because the law does not recognize such candidacy.

Mr. President, waiving the question of sympathy, waiving every question except that of power, I can not undertake to participate in the exercise of an assumed power because of some sentiment. I must be convinced that we have the power to legislate upon this question; and I am convinced that we have no such power.

Then, again, take the amendments that have been offered as a test. Senators have proceeded on the assumption that Congress could take some action that would determine who should be a Member of either House of Congress. The House can not participate in proceedings affecting the seat of a Senator, and the Senate can not participate in proceedings affecting the seat of a Member of the House, because those rights are fixed by the Constitution.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] suggests that that proposition was eliminated, but it is an indication of how far a fallacy of this kind may take hold upon the minds of men. I raised these objections in the committee, and I have seen no reason since to change my views in regard to the power of Congress. I know the reasons that are urged for this legislation, and, as a matter of sentiment, I might be induced to vote for such a provision were I convinced that we had the power; but without the power I can not cast my vote here or elsewhere to legislate upon this question so far as it is applied through the provisions that I have pointed out.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I understand the question is now on the passage of the bill and that we are about to have a vote. Before that action is taken I simply desire to say that I am in favor of a law which shall require the publication of election expenses. I am in favor of a law which shall amend the existing law in a vital particular. The existing law requires the publication of such expenses, but requires them to be made after the election. I am in favor of amending the law to the extent that these publications shall be made prior to the election, because it is an idle thing to publish them after the election. I should vote for the bill as it came from the House. I can not vote for the bill as it has been amended in the Senate. I will not repeat the reasons which I have already given why I oppose the amendment further than to say that I think the opportunity for tyranny and oppression, especially if there should be a partisan judiciary, in extending the provisions of this bill to the primary elections, and at the same time giving criminal jurisdiction to the Federal courts, will be almost unlimited. I think it will be absolutely destructive of the peace of the section of the country from which I come, and, therefore, with this amendment in the bill, I shall vote against it, although without the amendment I should vote for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would say nothing, but being paired, I take this opportunity of stating my position. I voted against the amendment which makes the law applicable to primary elections because I thought that an election might be perfectly honest and fair and a man might be elected beyond all challenge, although there had been fraud in the primary wherein he was nominated. It seemed to me that if that were the case all that either the Senate or the House could have to do with the case under their constitutional power to sit as judges on the qualifications, elections, and returns of their Members was as regarded the election itself. But the amendment having been adopted, and coming, as I do, from a State where at present, at any rate, the result of a primary is equivalent to the result of an election, it has seemed to me that possibly somebody somewhere might believe that we were not willing for the primaries to be investigated, if necessary; were not willing to see the full sunlight of publicity shed upon them; and although I think the amendment cripples the bill and seeks to confer upon the Federal Government a power that has nothing to do with the subject matter committed to the Federal Government, yet thinking that there is some slight doubt about the question, because possibly the primary might be regarded as one of the instrumentalities of the election, I should vote for the bill as amended if I were not paired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments offered to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected' and extending the same to Senators in Congress and to primary elections."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 18, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 18, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. HEYBURN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I give notice that on Friday, July 21, after the morning business, I will address the Senate on the reciprocity bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I give notice that on Saturday I shall address the Senate on the reciprocity bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No debate is in order on Saturday under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are we to vote immediately after the morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The agreement expressly provides that the bill is to be voted upon without further debate, following the routine morning business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will then give the notice for Friday, following the address of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. HEYBURN. I assume that under the rule the time is open to any Senator to speak, notwithstanding Senators have given notice covering all the time between the present and Saturday morning. I observe on this morning's calendar that every day is engaged, I think, but that does not exclude others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The giving of a notice is simply a matter of comity between Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would be very unfair if five Senators could mortgage all the time between now and the time for voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No mortgage is acquired by a notice other than whatever lien it may be upon the accustomed courtesy of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Ordinarily I would not give any notice at all of my intention. I am not quite sure that I shall desire to address the Senate, but as the Senator from Idaho has observed, the time is being appropriated by notices of this kind, and in order that I may not be foreclosed against the privilege, if I so desire, I gave the notice a moment ago.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Butte, Mont., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the South Broadway Christian Church, of Denver, Colo., and a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Presbyterian Church, of Timnath, Colo., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the National Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the National Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Sulzer resolution providing for an investigation into the present conditions existing at Ellis Island and also for a revision of the immigration laws, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (for Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama), from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2246) to amend the military record of John P. Fitzgerald, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 104) thereon.

Mr. OLIVER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2883) to correct the military record of David C. Stewart, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3045) to provide for agricultural entries on oil lands; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CHILTON:

A bill (S. 3046) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Malden, W. Va.; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3047) granting a pension to Lucinda Traub; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CULLOM:

A bill (S. 3048) granting an increase of pension to John W. Groesbeck; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 3049) granting an increase of pension to John E. Comstock (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 3050) to correct the naval record of David C. Stewart; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 3051) for the relief of Henry W. Carpenter; to the Committee on Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO HOMESTEADERS.

Mr. WARREN. I introduce a bill and I would be glad to have it read for this reason: I have been receiving a great many letters from the drought-stricken portion of the West—from my own State and other States. I have included a number of States in the bill and wish to have it appear in the RECORD, so that Senators from those States may either indorse or refrain from indorsing the measure.

The bill (S. 3052) granting leave of absence to certain homesteaders was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who have heretofore made homestead entries in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Minnesota, Washington, and Oregon, and the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, are hereby relieved from the necessity of residence upon their lands from the date of the approval of this act to April 15, 1912: Provided, That the time of actual absence during the period named shall not be deducted from the full time of residence required by law.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES UNDER THIRTEENTH CENSUS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 130) making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CHILTON, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the several petitions presented to the Senate in the Sixty-first Congress praying for a monument to the memory of the late James Rumsey, no adverse report having been made thereon.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 130. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain expenses of the House of Representatives incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Bankhead	Cullom	Myers	Sutherland
Borah	Dixon	Nelson	Swanson
Brandegee	Foster	Newlands	Taylor
Briggs	Gore	Nixon	Thornton
Bristow	Gronna	Oliver	Townsend
Brown	Heyburn	Overman	Warren
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Page	Watson
Burnham	La Follette	Perkins	Wetmore
Burton	Lippitt	Pomerene	Williams
Chamberlain	Lodge	Reed	Works
Chilton	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Clapp	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Clark, Wyo.	Martin, Va.	Smoot

Mr. BRYAN. My colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent in attendance on the Lorimer investigation committee. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the temporary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is engaged on the Lorimer investigating committee. I will let this announcement stand for the day, so far as calls for a quorum are concerned.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] is absent on the same committee.

Mr. REED. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. STONE] has been unavoidably detained in his office on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The first bill on the calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 237) for the proper observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill may go over, and that it be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is transferred under Rule IX.

Mr. BACON. I would suggest that possibly a motion to transfer the bill to the calendar under Rule IX ought to be postponed until the author of the bill is present. He is not here.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think all these bills that have been called daily and objected to ought to go under Rule IX. It seems to me that they are just as well off under Rule IX as under Rule VIII.

Mr. BACON. I myself have no special objection. I simply made the suggestion in the interest of an absent colleague. He will be here in a little while, and may agree to it himself.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are a number of members of the committee here. It had been my intention to ask that all these objected bills go to Rule IX. I was not selecting any particular bills at all.

The bill (S. 291) providing for the retirement of petty officers and enlisted men of the United States Navy or Marine Corps and for the efficiency of the enlisted personnel was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it may go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

The bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that it go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should not care to object to the transfer of this bill to Rule IX were the Senator in charge of it not absent. In his absence, I do object to such action.

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not see why the Senator should object. This is not a question of courtesy, but it is a question of legislative proceeding. The bill can be called up under Rule IX just as readily as under Rule VIII. The only object in transferring bills to Rule IX is that we may not be continually kept on the watch here on the call of bills under Rule VIII.

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator from Idaho wishes to make a general motion that all such bills be transferred to Rule IX, I have no objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. Such a motion can only be made as the bills are called on the calendar.

Mr. PAGE. But in the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who reported the bill, I feel it is only fair that it be allowed to go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I have said, I am not doing this in violation of any rule of courtesy. We are proceeding regularly under Rule VIII; and it is in order under Rule VIII to move to transfer these bills to Rule IX, whether the Senator in charge of them is present or not. When a bill goes to the calendar every Senator here is in charge of it. There are present a number of members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and it is only a question of having these bills so placed in the legislative procedure that we may not be continually kept on watch here for them on the call of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho request that the bill go to the calendar under Rule IX?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho moves that the bill be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. PAGE. I beg pardon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho to transfer the bill to the calendar under Rule IX.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill (S. 123) to alter the regulations respecting the manner of holding elections for Senators was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The bill (S. 1899) to repeal a portion of an act heretofore passed relating to the alienation of the title of the United States to land in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

The bill (S. 943) to improve navigation on Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the bill goes over, I ask that it go over under Rule IX.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not ask that that bill go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. I withdraw the request that the bill go to the calendar under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn. The bill goes over.

CIRCUIT JUDGES.

The bill (S. 2653) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over under Rule IX.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Idaho will not insist on that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not insist on it if the Senator from Utah is ready to have the bill now considered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The bill ought to be now taken up, considered, and passed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, let us take it up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 118 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," so as to read as follows:

SEC. 118. There shall be in the second, seventh, and eighth circuits, respectively, four circuit judges; in the fourth circuit, two circuit judges; and in each of the other circuits, three circuit judges, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They shall be entitled to receive a salary at the rate of $7,000 a year each, payable monthly. Each circuit judge shall reside within his circuit. The circuit judges in each circuit shall be judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit, and it shall be the duty of each circuit judge in each circuit to sit as one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals in that circuit from time to time according to law.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a bill has already passed the Senate increasing the number of judges in the fourth circuit. Might it not be advisable to have this bill conform to what the Senate has already done?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I dislike very much to object to the request made by the Senator from West Virginia. The bill to which he refers, although it has passed the Senate, has not become a law. This bill simply deals with a defect in existing law; it makes it clear that the circuit judges shall constitute the circuit court of appeals. It is very necessary that this bill should be enacted into law before the judiciary code goes into effect next January. If we add to it an amendment such as is suggested by the Senator from West Virginia, it may operate to tie it up and prevent its adoption. I think it would be far better to deal with the proposition of the Senator from West Virginia in the separate bill which he has introduced. Let that take its course. It is now pending in the House of Representatives. If the House of Representatives are in favor of it, they will pass it; if they are not in favor of it and we add it to this bill, then they will defeat this bill in order to defeat the Senator's bill.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, my only purpose in making the suggestion was to call the attention of those in charge of the bill to the situation produced by the bill which has already passed the Senate. In view of what the Senator has said, I shall not insist upon an amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill, being a special order for Tuesday next, will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill being a special order for Thursday, July 27, will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1898) providing for the protection of the interests of the United States in lands and waters comprising any part of the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, and lands adjacent thereto, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that bill go over under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

The bill (H. R. 2983) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the Thirteenth Census was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That bill being a special order, it will go over.

The bill (S. 2518) to provide for raising the volunteer forces of the United States in time of actual or threatened war was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 14) to admit the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona as States into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that joint resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over.

CONFEDERATE NAVAL MONUMENT, VICKSBURG NATIONAL MILITARY PARK.

The bill (S. 2925) providing for a Confederate naval monument in the Vicksburg National Military Park was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that go over under Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that bill may be now considered. It is recommended by the War Department——

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to its consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is also unanimously recommended by the Vicksburg Military Park Commission, and is reported favorably by the Military Affairs Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the bill going over under Rule IX?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is that the bill be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the effect of that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the bill would not be called up every time the calendar under Rule VIII was being considered. It practically has no other effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the transfer of the bill to the calendar under Rule IX. The bill will go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill, the objection of the Senator from Idaho to the contrary notwithstanding. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to have a division upon that question, and, if it be in order, I should like to explain what the bill is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill is not a debatable question. The Senator asks for a division.

Mr. GORE. Will the Chair kindly state the proposition?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 88, which the Secretary will again report by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2925) providing for a Confederate naval monument in the Vicksburg National Military Park.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill the Senator from Mississippi asks for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 17.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Bankhead	Cummins	Myers	Stone
Borah	Curtis	Nelson	Sutherland
Brandegee	Dixon	Newlands	Swanson
Briggs	Foster	Nixon	Taylor
Bristow	Gore	Oliver	Thornton
Brown	Gronna	Overman	Townsend
Bryan	Heyburn	Page	Warren
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Watson
Burton	La Follette	Pomerene	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Root	Williams
Chilton	Lodge	Shively	Works
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Crawford	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent before the vote is taken to explain the bill and the reason for my desire to have it taken up and passed at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the Senate upon the motion to take up the bill, which is not a debatable motion. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is the request to address the Senate on a motion to take up a bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To address the Senate upon the merits of the bill which the Senator from Mississippi has moved to take up.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, upon which a division has been asked.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 29, noes 19.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this bill, which is Senate bill 2925, appropriates now $50,000 for a memorial not to cost exceeding $125,000, commemorative of the services of the Confederate Navy on the Mississippi River and its tributaries during the Civil War. There has already been appropriated $200,000 for a memorial to commemorate the services of the Union Navy during that same campaign. There is a movement on foot to have a great national reunion of the Blue and the Gray at the semicentennial of the surrender of Vicksburg, on the 4th of July, 1913, and Maj. Rigby, chairman of the Vicksburg National Military Park Commission has made the request, which has been put in the form of a bill, so that the Union memorial having been virtually completed, the Confederate memorial may be completed at the same time, and the military park at Vicksburg will be in the condition of having the memorials of both sides finished so that the great reunion may see them both.

Mr. President, this bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs; it is recommended by the Secretary of War. Maj. Rigby was one of the most gallant officers of the Federal Army. The other commissioners are agreed with him upon the project, and I think it would be a nice thing to be able to have this memorial finished—the other one being finished—and have everything ready for this great reunion of the gallant men upon both sides who will fraternize with one another upon this great semicentennial occasion. I thought it well to make the report which accompanies the bill consist simply of Maj. Rigby's letter and the recommendation of the War Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 1, as follows:

That the sum of $125,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction, with the designs approved by the Secretary of War, including all necessary expenses connected therewith, of a naval memorial to be erected upon the site in the Vicksburg National Military Park selected by the Vicksburg National Military Park Commissioners and approved by the Secretary of War, commemorative of the services of the Confederate Navy in the operations of the Vicksburg campaign, March 29 to July 4, 1863, and in commemoration of naval operations upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That for the construction of a memorial to cost not to exceed $125,000, commemorative of the service of the Confederate Navy on the Mississippi River and its tributaries during the Civil War, at the site and in accordance with the design approved by the Secretary of War, the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I earnestly hope that this bill will pass. I have a peculiar interest in it, arising out of the fact that Capt. Rigby, the superintendent of the National Military Park at Vicksburg, is a soldier of my own State; a gallant, brave man, who for years has devoted himself to the service in which he is now employed.

I think there must be a misapprehension upon this side of the Chamber with regard to the subject of the bill. It has been a policy of the Government of the United States—and I think it is a worthy and prudent policy—to perpetuate the memory of the events of the Civil War, it matters not what we may believe with regard to the justice of the cause upon one side or the other.

The Civil War was the greatest event that occurred within the century. I think it is the greatest event in the annals of the human kind during the Christian era. The Government of the United States, recognizing the vast influences this war has had upon the civilization and upon the thought of man, has long ago entered upon the task or duty of perpetuating its great and principal days and times and events, and so we have established a series of military parks all over that part of the country in which the war raged, and among these parks is the one at Vicksburg. There is another at Shiloh; there is another at Chickamauga; and there is another at Chattanooga; and another at Gettysburg, and so on.

With respect to each of these parks the Government has invited the several States having soldiers in the Civil War, whether upon the side of the North or the side of the South, it matters not, to erect monuments to their soldiery, to the heroism of their dead, to the heroism of their living, who fought upon these battle fields. And so at Vicksburg, every State in the South, as well as every State in the North, was invited to erect monuments to signify the valor of the men who fought upon that battle field, it matters not whether they fought for the North or for the South. There was in the invitation thus extended no expression of opinion as to the justice of the cause for which either side fought. It was intended merely to make the world understand the greatness of the event itself, and so many States of the Union, including my own, have erected monuments upon the battle field of Vicksburg, and many States of the South have erected monuments for the Confederate dead and the Confederate living on the battle field of Vicksburg.

The Government has already appropriated money to erect a monument to signify the valor of its Navy in the warfare on the Mississippi River. Now it is asked that the Government appropriate a less sum to erect a monument to perpetuate the bravery of the Confederate Navy; and it seems to me that it is a beautiful sentiment. I can not understand how anyone who loves courage and who reveres the hero, either of the North or the South, can object to this evidence of a Nation's appreciation of the vastness of the event itself.

The commission having control over the Vicksburg Park, as well as every other park, is composed partly of northern soldiers and partly of southern soldiers. When a few years ago it became my duty as well as very great pleasure to dedicate monuments which had been erected upon this battle field in honor of the soldiers of Iowa, the chairman of the commission was that gallant soldier, a man whose memory is dear to every loyal and patriotic heart, even though he fought upon the other side, Gen. Stephen D. Lee. I am sure his heart was just as full of love for the Union and love for the old flag as either of his associates upon the commission. I know that a citizen of my own State, Capt. Rigby, who has been there for many years, could not and would not suggest the erection of a monument that would in anywise reflect upon the cause of the Union during the Civil War, nor would the commission which has the larger control, nor would the War Department which finally passes upon all these recommendations.

I very earnestly hope that the Senate will pass this bill.

Mr. DIXON obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Montana pardon me a second for just an interruption?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that there is some objection to the word "service" in line 8 on page 2. I did not word that myself. It came as a suggestion from Maj. Rigby and from the commission. In order to obviate an objection that may flow out of the use of that word, there probably being those who think it is not the proper word, I shall move that the word "service" be stricken out and the words "courage and constancy" substituted for it, so that it will read "commemorative of the courage and constancy of the Confederate Navy." I have no objection in the world to that.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, it is much easier at times to vote in accordance with your feelings of sentiment than it is in accordance with a strict sense of public duty, and I confess that this bill raises a question in my mind which makes me somewhat halt between two opinions. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and this is the first time I knew that this bill had ever been reported to the Senate. That probably is on account of my dereliction of duty in not attending at all times every meeting of the committee.

It is a little difficult for me personally to express my real feelings regarding a matter of this kind. I am a southerner born, Mr. President. My mother's people served in the Confederate Army, while my father's kinsmen, some of them, served in the Army for the Preservation of the Union. I think, without a feeling of egotism, that I can therefore look on the period of the Civil War with as broad and catholic a spirit as any patriotic American citizen can do.

Personally, I have only the greatest feeling of admiration for the heroic men who laid down their lives for the lost cause of the Confederacy. I doubt whether in all history there is any more superb example of devotion to what they believed to be a principle than that which inspired the people of the South from 1861 to 1865. At the same time the principle for which they contended was eternally wrong. It was one of the questions which rise from a great disturbance of men's minds, not questioning any man's feeling of right or wrong in the matter. But looking back 45 years to that period, we know that the principle for which the South contended was wrong, that it would have been fatal to the very existence of republican institutions.

I further want to supplement that by referring to something the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said a few moments ago. I remember two years ago this summer visiting the battle field of Gettysburg in company with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I do not believe I have ever spent a day where my feelings of pure patriotism were so enlightened and ennobled as the 12 hours that we spent on that battle field that morning and afternoon. I remember when we reached the point on Cemetery Ridge where Pickett's charge broke through the Union lines I was telling the Senator from Iowa the story of the Twenty-sixth North Carolina Regiment, that was recruited in my own county, and in which charge some of my own kinsmen laid down their lives. It was with a feeling of pride that I told him the story of the record of the Twenty-sixth North Carolina Infantry, which held the record of both armies, Federal and Confederate, for loss in battle during the Civil War; and when we reached the point where the big bronze book lay open at the little clump of trees, with the line underneath on the pedestal "High tide at Gettysburg," telling on one side the story of the valor and bravery and the heroism of the men who wore the gray and on the opposite page of the bronze book the valor and heroism and devotion of the men who wore the blue, I took off my hat—not metaphorically, but physically—for it seemed to me that we stood on holy ground.

At that point, in passing, I want to correct a little error that has crept into the school histories and magazine and newspaper history of this country relating to that phase of the Civil War.

The ordinary school history and magazine article refer to that heroic charge of heroic men as the charge of Pickett's Virginians. Gen. George Pickett was himself a Virginian. But as a matter of cold fact and actual history the majority of the men who constituted Pickett's division that charged across that mile of open ground in the face of 150 Federal cannon and 80,000 rifles were North Carolinians; and as I called the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the record in the bronze book that lay open there, it recurred to me that the majority of those regiments that made for themselves names on the page of history were North Carolina regiments—not that it detracted from the bravery of the Virginians on that occasion—but I merely at this time diverge from what I am about to say to give public utterance to that fact, that the men of my own native State may not be robbed of their part in that heroic struggle.

In saying what I have, Mr. President, I have only done so in order to give some conception of my own feeling in this matter. I recognize the bravery and the courage of the men who were connected with the Confederate Navy on the Mississippi River and her tributaries during and before the Vicksburg campaign. I should personally be willing to contribute my own small share toward the erection of a monument to their heroism and their courage. I have in the past made cheerful contribution to the Confederate monument at the county seat of my own county in North Carolina, and I did it with a feeling that I was in a small way contributing to the perpetuation of the memory of those brave and heroic men.

But, Mr. President, is this the proper time for us to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury to perpetuate by Federal law the acts of those who sought to destroy the very Government from which this appropriation is now sought? Seventy-five years after the War of the Roses had terminated in England no one inquired on which side their ancestors fought, except as a matter of pure historic investigation. The English people were alike proud of the men who fought on both sides in that great epoch in English history, whether under the banner of York or of Lancaster.

Probably 45 years from to-day, maybe 30 years from to-day, it might be in good taste. It may then be meet and proper for the Federal Government to appropriate the money to perpetuate in bronze the memory of Confederate sailors and soldiers that served during the Civil War.

There are probably half a million Federal soldiers still living. I doubt, Mr. President, the wisdom that would take money from the Federal Treasury at this time to perpetuate by official act of this Government during the lifetime of the half million men who wore the blue and who by their own heroic sacrifices perpetuated this Republic to build a monument—I read—commemorative of the service of the Confederate Navy on the Mississippi River and its tributaries during the Civil War.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. DIXON. I notice the Senator from Mississippi has withdrawn that, I think, most unfortunate use of words.

I do not believe, Mr. President, the time has yet come for this Government to do these things officially. In a private capacity, in the capacity of a Southern State, in the capacity of an organization of Confederate veterans, I think they are eminently proper. I think the men of the North, with perfect consistency, would gladly contribute their personal funds for the erection of this monument; but I do not believe at this time the Government should enter on this plan, which is merely the entering wedge. A monument at Vicksburg to the Confederate Navy is merely a prelude to a hundred other appropriations for a hundred other battle fields.

The valor of Confederate soldiers can not be told in one bronze column at Vicksburg. By the same rule of action and applying the same yardstick, if it is right to appropriate $150,000 for this monument at Vicksburg, then we ought also to dot the battle fields of the Civil War with bronze monuments to the men who died in the cause that they believed to be right.

With this feeling, Mr. President, and with a feeling of regret that my judgment and my conscience do not allow me to vote for this measure, and wishing only to make my own sentiment plain, I am compelled by what I conceive to be my duty to all the country, at this time to cast my vote in opposition to the appropriation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I join in the hope expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that this bill may pass. I had the honor when a mere boy to render some modest and inconspicuous service to my country as a private soldier in the Union Army. I am always pleased and gratified to hear of the reunions that are held between the boys in blue and the boys in gray. I should like very much to see these reunions exemplified and typified in the monuments that are proposed to be erected if this bill shall pass.

To my mind there is no question here as to whether the people of the South in those dark days were right or wrong. The battle has been fought, this country has been reunited, and we are here as a body representing the whole country, North and South. The Senators from the South have joined time and again in passing laws appropriating money for the purpose of commemorating the acts and deeds of the soldiers of the Union Army.

I think in the minds of the Union soldiers there is no animosity left for the soldiers of the Confederate Army. They mean just what they say, good will to the boys in gray, when they hold these reunions. There is no reason, it seems to me, why the Government might not commemorate in this way not the fact that these men were right but that they were brave, courageous men, fighting, as I believe, for what they believed to be right.

I do hope that the Senate may pass this bill. I think it is just and right, and that it will bring nearer together the people of the North and South.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in the proposed committee amendment, line 8, strike out the word "service" and in lieu insert the words "courage and constancy."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I regret more than I can express the occasion which calls for the consideration of this question or any kindred question. A few days ago a matter was before the Senate for consideration in which was involved something of the spirit of this proposed legislation. On that occasion I felt it my duty to oppose the measure.

I do not understand, I am incapable of understanding, how a man loyal in his heart to his country can remain silent while it is proposed to build at the expense of the Government of the United States a monument commemorating the services of those who tried to destroy the country. If it were a monument to them personally, and did not involve in express terms the acts of attempted destruction of the country, it might be subject to such a construction as would make it tolerable. But to recite in an act of the Congress of the United States that the Public Treasury should be called upon to pay for the erection of a monument commemorating the acts of attempted destruction is intolerable.

It might be imagined from the squibs of the newspapers that I found a pleasure in discussing or speaking of or thinking of these questions. I do not. The newspapers evidently are in sympathy with this kind of legislation. The mail has been bringing to me day after day, since a few days ago, expressions from newspapers, garbled, untrue, intended to deceive as to what I said and as to what I meant. If the preservation of this country depended upon the newspapers, God save it, for no other power could. They are not all disloyal. Some are loyal but silent. Some are disloyal but blatant. Some of them delight to express their disloyalty and to criticize unfairly men who dare to be loyal or to express loyal sentiments. The press has ceased to have an influence upon great questions. The people of the United States have lost confidence in it because it threw away the right to claim their confidence.

My mail is bringing to me daily and hourly unsigned letters of abuse and criticism; cowardly letters; letters threatening to come to Washington and destroy my features and my life, unsigned, probably written in the back room of some barroom, and, instead of being on the way to Washington, they were probably on the way to get another drink. They are not printable because of their indecency, and they remain tied together as a relic of barbarism.

Mr. President, when this question came before the highest tribunal in the United States it was dealt with by one of the ablest and most conservative men who ever sat on that bench, a man who was honored not only by his position upon that bench, but by his designation outside of those duties to perform great international duties. I refer to Mr. Justice Swayne. He deals with this question. I feel inclined to revivify the record of this body by some citations from the decision in the case of Hickman against Jones, in Ninth Wallace's Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, at page 197 and following. I do this because it seems that the only sentiment, or practically the only sentiment, that is considered entitled to consideration on this occasion is one against the cause of the Union.

Men are silent in regard to the cause of the Union. That is what brought on the Rebellion. Men sat in the Congress of the United States whose sworn duty it was to stand up and defend with their voice and their vote against the proposed disunion, and their silence did more to bring about that condition than any words which were spoken by any man. It was assumed that there was no word to be said; that there were no grounds upon which to defend against the claimed right of disruption and secession. Those men sat in the Congress of the United States silent when the claims of treason were being pictured in eloquent and stirring phrase. The result was that those who were proposing to disrupt the Union took it for granted that the Union had but few friends who dared to speak for it, and the result was that war, that great war for which these men in that age of plain speaking called "dough faces" were responsible.

There are times when a man has no right to be silent. Their silence, their cowardice cost the lives of millions of men on both sides; it cost thousands of millions of treasure; it cost four years of practical stagnation in the domestic business of the country; it cost to the growing generation during those four years the opportunity and the attainment of training and education that have marked their career since that day. Boys who would have been equipped but for this terrible condition for the active and intelligent walks of life went through the world in the lines of uneducated, untrained, and unequipped manhood. I am in doubt as to which loss was greatest, the loss by death or the loss by destroyed opportunity during that time. It was not all in the North; it was in the country, because it was all one country.

And this awful appalling condition is to be celebrated! Those responsible for it are to be pictured in marble and on canvas at the expense of the Government they tried to destroy! It is a shame.

They have coined a few pet phrases with which to defend themselves, and the phrases of defense are equally flimsy. I notice in many papers, because of my true statements of a few days ago—they are referring to me by name—that I am waving the bloody flag. That is a silly statement, and it is about on a par with the people who use it; they are silly people and that is a silly statement. They have not the intelligence and they have not the dignity nor the manhood nor the bravery to discuss it fairly and openly without epithet, so they resort to that. I have here in my desk—they are coming in every mail; they are laid on my desk while I am talking—squibs from newspapers that profess to be molders of public opinion; that profess to be representatives of intellectual thought. They start out with headlines calling me by name, and saying, "He waves the bloody flag in the United States Senate." Such things are only worthy of notice in order that they may be properly characterized. They do not bother me any. Gracious! If I were so constituted that I were bothered by that kind of thing I would have been worn out a lifetime ago. I remember when that element used to point to me and others as we went along the streets and roads, and say "Woolly head! Woolly head!" That was the argument they had to justify their sympathy with treason and rebellion—a great argument, just about on a par with this cry of waving the bloody flag.

There is no newspaper reporter in the gallery who is brave enough to report a discussion of this matter fairly and truthfully—not one of them. It would be curious, if one were of a curious turn of mind, to see the garbled, untruthful statements they make about it.

The other day when the Washington Evening Star left out the word "not," so as to make me appear to have said just the opposite of what I did say, when I called their attention to it here from the floor on the next morning and they had the official RECORD to go to for the truth, they were too cowardly to mention it. They never take back a lie when they have printed it; it is against their policy to do it, because they are cowards; that is all.

Mr. President, we are to a large extent confronted with that condition of affairs to-day. Men stop to consider when they are determining whether they will do right what the cost of it will be. Not all men; there are more good men, brave men, and true men in this country than there are of the opposite kind; but, unfortunately, they do not always attend on these occasions.

I did not bring on this discussion this morning; I did not come into the doors of this Chamber with a bloody flag in my hand nor a bloody garment of any kind. I came in here and found men boasting that they were in possession of it. I shall be just as impersonal and moderate in the treatment of this question as it is possible for me to be. It is a very difficult and trying situation, but I trust that I shall be able to deal with it fairly. I repeat, I am not responsible for its being here. It refers to a period in the history of this country between the 13th day of April, 1861, and a corresponding day in 1865—four years of political conditions that have been characterized as conditions of war. The generations that have been born since that time smile at it. To them it is history; to some it is a memory. It is a history of murder by the hundreds of thousands, but it does not seem to appall them, because they were not then born. Let us see if it was. Mr. Justice Swayne says:

> During the late Civil War the rebel government established a court known as the District Court of the Confederate States of America for the Northern District of Alabama.

That is quoted, and it is in the body of Justice Swayne's opinion, an opinion which is concurred in by the whole court.

> In that court the plaintiff in error was indicted for treason against the Confederate States. The indictment alleged that troops of the United States were in the northern district of Alabama engaged in a hostile enterprise against the Confederate States, and that Hickman "did traitorously then and there assemble and continue with the said troops of the said United States in the prosecution of their said expedition against the Confederate States; and then and there, with force and arms and with the traitorous intention of cooperating with the said troops of the United States in effecting the object of the said hostile expedition, did array and dispose himself with them in a hostile and warlike manner against the said Confederate States; and then and there, with force and arms, in pursuance of such his traitorous intentions, he, the said James Hickman, with the said persons, so as aforesaid assembled, armed, and arrayed in manner aforesaid, wickedly and traitorously did levy war against the said Confederate States."

That is the quotation.

> Upon this indictment a warrant was issued for the arrest of Hickman. He was arrested and imprisoned accordingly. He applied to the defendant, Jones, who assumed to act as judge of the court, to be allowed to give bail. Jones rejected the application and remanded him to prison. He was subsequently tried, acquitted, and discharged. He alleges that the proceeding was without probable cause and malicious. Moore was the clerk of the pretended court. The name of Regan is signed to the indictment as district attorney, and he conducted the trial.
> Robert W. Coltart was deputy marshal, and Clay was the editor and publisher of the Huntsville Confederate, a newspaper through which it was alleged he incited the prosecution by means of malicious attacks upon Hickman designed to produce that result. The other defendants were members of the grand jury by which the indictment was found. Testimony was given tending to show that the plaintiff sympathized with the rebellion and participated in it while the rebel power predominated in north Alabama, both before and after its first invasion by the forces of the United States. The court instructed the jury, among other things, as follows:
> "If, in the case at the bar, you believe that the acts and speeches of the plaintiff, upon which the defendants rely to prove his complicity with the rebellion, were the result of anything less than a fear that if he did not so speak and act, his life or his liberty or his property would be sacrificed to his silence or his omission, you will find a verdict for the defendants.
>
> "If, on the other hand, you believe that these acts of apparent complicity with the rebellion were performed by the plaintiff under the influence of an honest and rational apprehension that to do otherwise would expose him to persecution or prosecution, or to loss of life, liberty, or property, and that notwithstanding these acts of affiliation with the rebel community in which he lived, he was always at heart honestly and truly loyal to the Government of his country, he is entitled to your verdict."

That is the end of the instruction.

> The jury were further instructed that it was their duty to acquit the defendants, R. W. Coltart and Clay. Exceptions were duly taken by the plaintiff, and the case is brought here for review.
> We have to complain in this case, as we do frequently, of the manner in which the bill of exceptions has been prepared.

I will pass the criticism of the court upon the record.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I am a little puzzled to know how this case came on appeal from the Confederate district court of Alabama to the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think there will be no difficulty in understanding that if the Senator will patiently listen.

Mr. DIXON. I do not understand how an appeal lay from that court to the United States court.

Mr. HEYBURN. This was a proceeding in damages afterwards.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, after the war.

Mr. HEYBURN. A proceeding to recover damages for these acts. Now, the court says, getting down to the case:

> The rebellion out of which the war grew was without any legal sanction. In the eye of the law it had the same properties as if it had been the insurrection of a county or smaller municipal territory against the State to which it belonged. The proportions and duration of the struggle did not affect its character. Nor was there a rebel government de facto in such a sense as to give any legal efficacy to its acts.

I call the attention of Senators to this statement in determining the status and character of the organization called "the Confederacy":

> It was not recognized by the national nor by any foreign government. It was not at any time in possession of the capital of the Nation. It did not for a moment displace the rightful Government. That Government was always in existence, always in the regular discharge of its functions, and constantly exercising all its military power to put down the resistance to its authority in the insurrectionary States. The Union of the States, for all the purposes of the Constitution, is as perfect and indissoluble as the union of the integral parts of the States themselves; and nothing but revolutionary violence can in either case destroy the ties which hold the parts together. For the sake of humanity certain belligerent rights were conceded to the insurgents in arms. But the recognition did not extend to the pretended Government of the Confederacy. The intercourse was confined to its military authorities. In no instance was there intercourse otherwise than of this character. The rebellion was simply an armed resistance to the rightful authority of the sovereign. Such was its character in its rise, progress, and downfall. The act of the Confederate Congress creating the tribunal in question was void. It was as if it were not. The court was a nullity, and could exercise no rightful jurisdiction. The forms of law with which it clothed its proceedings gave no protection to those who, assuming to be its officers, were the instruments by which it acted. In the case before us trespass would have been the appropriate remedy, but the authorities are clear that case also may be maintained. Each form of action is governed by its own principles. It is needless to consider them, as none of the exceptions taken relate to that subject. Our opinion will be confined to those which have been specifically mentioned.

The court then proceeds to consider the evidence and the instructions to the jury. It reversed the judgment and remanded the cause to the court below, with an order to issue a venire de novo.

There is the legal status of this great, much lauded, highly praised organization that undertook to destroy this great country. The acts characterized by Mr. Justice Swayne as acts of disturbance and riot are sought to be made the basis of a raid upon the Treasury of the United States to commemorate those acts. When that may be done with the sanction of the Congress of the United States and of the people of the United States, I want my life to end right there, and I care not how it ends, because a man without a country has nothing to live for. If we have no country, let us know it. A country can not exist without patriotism, and patriotism must be in control of the affairs of the people, and patriotism and treason must not be confused. They are not interchangeable terms.

I have a letter from a man who says he is on the way here now with a gun, and he describes how he is going to shoot me to pieces. If you start in to tear down the sentiment of loyalty in this country, he can not get here too quickly for me. Of course he will not come. He is some miserable coward who does not sign his name.

Mr. President, that case does not stand alone in its expression of principle as the law of this land. We have it again in White against Hart, in 13 Wallace, on page 646. The statement of the doctrine grows stronger as the courts have considered it. We have it in the First National Bank against Texas, in 20 Wallace, 87; we have it in Dewing against Perdicaries, in 96 United States, 195; we have it in Daniels against Tearney, in 102 United States, 418; we have it in a line of cases—I will not place them all in the RECORD, but there are more than 20 of them—in which that tribunal, that has always stood fair for the Union and the preservation of our country, has characterized this act that is now sought to be deified as merely a rebellion, and they have characterized it as treasonable.

Mr. President, there is an unholy haste about this proposition. A member of the Committee on Military Affairs has stated from his seat this morning that his attention had not been called to the fact that such a measure was even proposed, and yet that committee reports it as though it were the unanimous action of the committee. The report does not indicate that it is not the unanimous report of the committee, and my memory may be at fault, but I think it was stated here that it was the unanimous report, and had I time and opportunity I think I would inquire of other members of the committee. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States is in the hands of a Committee on Military Affairs who will sympathize with that proposed legislation. It is a sorry day for the country and for the Senate if that is true.

The time has come to speak plainly of this matter and dispassionately. There is no more important matter before the Senate than this. Send out the message to the children of this country that treason has been made respectable and will be marked by monuments, and then you can have recall and direct primaries and initiative and referendum and all of the other destructive bacteria in the system of the Government. You will have them there. You will have them. You will have them in the minds of the children, and the minds of children will be the minds of the statesmen some day.

It is a long time since I saw such a smiling look of gladness upon the faces on the other side of this Chamber when they realize that they have found among men who were supposed to stand for the principles of our Government enough to enable them to project upon the consideration of this body on this especial occasion a proposition of this kind. I can imagine their hearts are smiling. They forget the price paid to preserve this Union from destruction. It is a matter of jest. Why, the other day they placed upon the pension roll in idleness and inefficiency a man because he had been loyal to treason. Why not speak plainly? That is what the courts say it is. Why not speak plainly? Why not be plain about it? That was the beginning. I will show you where it began a little further back. Let me read this for the edification of some of the patriots. I read an article from the Dallas Morning News of Monday, February 21, 1910. I will read this into the RECORD. It will be good history:

OBJECT TO PORTRAIT OF LINCOLN—CONFEDERATES INQUIRE OF SCHOOL BOARD WHY HIS PICTURE IS HUNG AT COLONIAL HILL SCHOOL.

[The Dallas Morning News, Monday, Feb. 21, 1910.]

At a meeting of Sterling Price Camp, United Confederate Veterans, yesterday afternoon resolutions were passed authorizing the historical committee to ascertain by what authority the portrait of Abraham Lincoln was hung on the walls of the Colonial Hill School.

The following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas this camp is reliably informed that the picture of Abraham Lincoln has, at the suggestion of the Mothers' Club of Colonial Hill School, in this city, been placed on the wall of said school building, much to the mortification and chagrin of the majority of the patrons of the school: Be it

"Resolved, 1. That the historical committee of this camp call upon the school board of the city of Dallas and ascertain if said picture was placed there by consent of said board.

"2. That said school board be requested to enact such regulations as will prevent the introduction, use, or honoring of the picture of any person, living or dead, being placed on the walls of any public building where our children assemble, or the reading or recitation of any literary production which magnifies and honors those who sought our humiliation or ignores and abuses the virtue and honor of those who have made the Southland the synonym of patriotism and loyalty to constitutional liberty, and that the committee report at the next meeting."

Commander Gen. R. M. Gano presided at the meeting and Asst. Adjt. George W. Blair kept the minutes.

The relief committee reported a number of comrades sick, but none of them seriously so. Notification was given the camp of the death of Comrade John W. Carroll at 647 Commerce Street and of the funeral services to be held this afternoon at 2 o'clock at the Confederate Cemetery.

I read it all because I wanted the complete article to go in.

Now, I have seen that same class of thing repeated a great many times. I read this as a fair sample of such proceedings had throughout various parts of the South. And yet they come here and ask us that the Government Treasury of the United States shall be used for the purpose of erecting monuments to them, living or dead. Where is the spirit of patriotism of those who, when the traitor's hand was reached out to destroy the Union, left their homes and their families, abandoning everything, in order that they might go down into this poetic Southland, of which its inhabitants are so fond of speaking, and save the Union? What is that spirit? There was a time in this body when every seat on this side would have been filled with men whose patriotic impulses would have made them impatient to answer "aye" to the roll call. There never would have been a war except for just that kind of inert, flabby, unappreciative men. I do not wonder that the South thought they had an easy game when they started.

Mr. President, there were back in the fields, on the farms, in the villages and the towns and the cities in every household millions of men who, without compensation in dollars, were willing to go to the front and redeem the country against the result of the inaction and lack of patriotism of their representatives. And they went, and they redeemed it, thank God! But the generation has almost passed away.

There are a few hundred thousand old veterans left who this morning are weeping and praying that the spirit of patriotism that actuated them and their comrades may be called up from the realms of the memory of the past. They are waiting. I can see them, waiting to see whether or not there is in this hour any remnant of the patriotism that actuated them when they went to the field of battle. How do you suppose they feel? I do not mean all of them. There are some men who never did understand the cause for which they were supposed to stand. I will not be personal on this occasion. But to hear a man stand up anywhere and say that he enlisted to preserve the Union against an armed foe and that to-day he is ready to honor that foe puts me upon inquiry.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not have yielded for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am, of course, foreclosed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Crawford	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Bailey	Curtis	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Davis	Martin, Va.	Smoot
Bourne	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Stephenson
Brandegee	Dixon	Nixon	Stone
Briggs	Foster	Oliver	Sutherland
Brown	Gore	Overman	Swanson
Bryan	Gronna	Page	Taylor
Burnham	Heyburn	Paynter	Thornton
Burton	Hitchcock	Perkins	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene	Watson
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Reed	Williams
Clapp	Kern	Root	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Shively

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the roll call afforded me the opportunity to read some more very choice literature, received since I have been on my feet—Richmond, Va., I think, is the postmark. I have here an envelope that came to me through the mails. I merely call attention to this to show how insidiously these things creep up on the Government. Here it is:

Go to Little Rock in 1911 and get a glimpse of heaven.

There is the flag that was borne by these rebellious armies in the hour they were trying to destroy the Union. It goes through the United States mail side by side with the stamp that bears the face of Franklin or Washington and with the mark of the Government's mailing clerk on it—beside it. We have reached that stage. The Post Office Department of the United States says they know of no law to prevent that. There ought to be no necessity for a law. Taking those of the South at their word, that they acquiesce in the result of that strife and are glad the Union was saved, they ought not to want to do that. The fact that they want to do it is one of those things that needs explanation, and is in itself a question as to their sincerity. There is but one flag in this country that any man has a right to recognize, and that is the Stars and Stripes.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Idaho suspend for a moment? The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 4412.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield the floor in order that the Senator from Missouri may discuss the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. STONE. No; I will say I rose merely to state that I am not physically in a condition to address the Senate to-day, as I had given notice I would do. I have not been well for several days, and I do not feel that I should undertake to speak now. I will find an opportunity before the vote is taken—at least, I hope to do so—when I say what I have in mind to say. I do desire to give some reasons why I favor the reciprocity bill, so called, and why I am opposed to amendments to it, with some miscellaneous observations.

If it does not interfere with the plans of other Senators, I think now I will address the Senate on Friday morning after the routine business, and I will state that it is not my intention to detain the Senate very long. I am quite sure that I can conclude what I have to say within an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] gave notice this morning that he would address the Senate immediately at the close of the routine morning business on Friday.

Mr. STONE. I will simply try to find an opportunity, which I have no doubt I will, without giving any particular notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If no amendment be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who have already given notices to speak on the bill. If there is no one present who desires to address the Senate on the bill, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate adjourn. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. SHIVELY. I am not going to debate it. I ask the Senator to withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; I will withhold the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah withholds his motion.

Mr. SHIVELY. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah about a document which was ordered printed early in the session. An order was made one morning here to incorporate in the document the proceedings of Congress in reference to the Walker tariff of 1846 and the tariff of 1857, and there was also an order—it may not have been all in one document—to incorporate the proceedings with reference to the Canadian agreement of 1854. It does seem that those documents should be before the Senate. We are to vote on this question in a few days, and it would be useless to have them printed after the debate is over.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember well the order of the Senate, and it was also ordered that the document should be printed under the direction of the Committee on Finance. All those documents have been gathered together. I will say to the Senator that it was rather hard to obtain a number of them, and one or two members of the Finance Committee made requests for other documents. The work has gone on as fast as possible. I wish to say to the Senator also that all the matter is in print, and we expect that it will be ready to-morrow for distribution to Senators.

Mr. SHIVELY. I am glad to hear the Senator make that statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the motion further.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the following amendment to the bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CULBERSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair for the day with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. Consequently I will withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CRAWFORD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. Not knowing what his vote would be on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. He is not present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were present, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. CRANE] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. BACON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I will transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the negative). I am informed by the Democratic whip that some one has already used the pair of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. So I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent, engaged on the Lorimer investigating committee, and is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask if the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will then transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily absent on the Lorimer investigating committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. My colleague [Mr. LEA] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—24.

du Pont	Lorimer	Rayner

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there amendments to be offered to the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I do not propose to speak with reference to the pending bill, but with reference to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I think it is rather late in the day for Senators of the United States to stand upon this floor and reopen the wounds of the Civil War. Like the Senator from Idaho, I belonged to the "infantry" during the war.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask if the Senator is asking me a question?

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not ask the Senator any question.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was merely a passing remark?

Mr. TAYLOR. I decline to ask the Senator a question. I think all informed men know that the Civil War did not begin in 1861. It began when this Republic was born. It crept into the Constitution and lay hidden there like some invisible cobra. It was fought out for 60 years in every forum, in the columns of the press, and everywhere, until it finally culminated in the clash of arms. It was a struggle between the doctrine of Federal supremacy on the one hand and the doctrine of State sovereignty on the other. It culminated at last in 1861. It was the conflict that Webster foresaw when he exclaimed upon this floor:

> When my eyes shall be turned to behold for the last time the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land drenched with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood!

It was the struggle that Clay put off for a quarter of a century with his great compromise measures. It was the struggle that Andrew Jackson delayed when he held up his bony hand toward heaven and swore:

> By the Eternal, the Union must and shall be preserved!

But neither Webster, nor Clay, nor Jackson, nor any other power under the sun could prevent it. It finally broke upon the land, and death stood grim and terrible on a hundred battle fields, beckoning a million men to the opening grave.

The North came out of that war the victor, but the men who wore the gray did not sulk. They laid down the musket and canteen and entered in good faith all the armies of industry.

I do not believe that a man can be a good citizen who will now stand anywhere under the flag and attempt to keep the sections of this Union apart.

Mr. President, I am an American. I believe in American ideals and American institutions. Every State in the Union is as much my State as Tennessee is my State, and the deeds of every great American soldier in that war are my heritage and the heritage of my children.

Many times I have stood out there in the rotunda before the statue of Ulysses S. Grant, the leader of the Union Armies, and my heart thrilled with pride that he was an American, and I admired him for his genius in war and his generosity to the South in peace, and when I have turned away from him and looked upon the statue of another great American soldier, standing there silent in the Hall of Fame in his Confederate uniform, I have wondered how any American, whether in the North or in the South, could be so oblivious to those noble and God-like qualities of brain and heart which make men truly great as to sneer at the name of Lee.

Mr. President, the war is over. Time has pulled down the forts and leveled the trenches. Time has healed and comforted, until now there is nothing left but precious memories. The men who wore the gray delight to honor the brave men who wore the blue and who met them in battle for the settlement of a controversy that began with the Republic. But they do not love the men who never smelt gunpowder and who now fight the war over again and unlimber their batteries of bitterness on the cemeteries of the South and upon the statues and monuments to her heroic dead.

The South has struggled to the front in all the elements of industry. The men who wore the gray are as true to the flag to-day as the men who wore the blue. Their sons have fought under the Stars and Stripes since that Civil War. I was governor of my State when the Spanish War came on, and when President McKinley called for volunteers I was one of the first governors to put my quota in the field. I came here to beg the President to let me have more regiments. They joined the sons of the men who wore the blue to fight for their country.

During that war I was down in Mississippi. I went into a little town and found a coterie of young men bitterly protesting against the sons of Confederate soldiers marching under the Federal flag and wearing that blue uniform. I saw an old man sitting among them. Finally he said, "Young men, I do not wish to engage in your discussion, but I followed the stars and bars four long weary years. I surrendered at Appomattox. I went home barefooted and in rags, to find my country desolate and my home in ashes. I swore eternal vengeance against that flag and against that uniform. But one day not long ago I saw a Mississippi regiment marching up the street under that flag and in that uniform, and I saw my boy in the ranks. I rushed to the colonel and said to him, 'Make these boys take off that uniform and let them wear the gray in this war, and show to the world how the sons of Confederate veterans can fight.' But the colonel smiled and said, 'No; they must wear the blue and march under the old flag.' I went to my home, still nursing my revenge more than ever. But when they brought my boy home in his coffin and I bent over him and looked upon him there in his blue uniform and wrapped in his country's flag, in a moment all the animosities of the past vanished, and I said, 'Henceforth that is my flag, that uniform is my uniform, and henceforth this whole country is my country.'"

Mr. President, this is the spirit that must now animate the people of this country. The men of the South for 40 years have contributed their part to build monuments to the Federal dead. They have contributed their part in pensions to the men who wore the blue. Now, after 46 years have come and gone, while we are building a monument in the South to commemorate the deeds of the brave men who followed the Federal flag, is it asking too much to build a monument to the brave men who met them face to face on the battle field and upon the water?

Why not build it? The southern people were not guilty of treason. They fought for what they believed was right. No man will die for a cause which he does not believe is right.

Mr. President, it is the best way in the world to wipe out the sectional lines. It is the best way in the world to make us truly one people, with common hopes, common fears, and a common destiny. I appeal to the Senate, especially to the men of the North, to vote for this pittance to honor the courage and the bravery of the men who fought under the stars and bars, and we will stand there under Old Glory and say to the men who followed it, "Unfurl it to the breezes, for it is the flag of our reunited country," and the men who wore the gray will stand under it with uncovered heads and acknowledge it as their flag. But who will chide them if they sometimes bring to light that other flag, the blood-stained stars and bars, to look upon it and weep over it and press it to their bosoms, for it is hallowed with memories of the blessed past? And they know that it is furled forever.

Mr. President and Senators, I have but little patience with the man either in private or in public life who awakens the passions of the past. I do not believe it is good patriotism or good Americanism. So far as I am concerned, I have sat upon the Committee on Pensions and for four years voted pensions to the men who wore the blue, and ex-Confederate soldiers have sat there by me.

What the South wants is peace, and I stand here to-day, as a representative of the generation that came on after the war, to declare to Senators who represent the States of the North that if there is ever another war in this country it will not come from the South, but her sons will be ever ready to march shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart with the men who wore the blue for the preservation of our Union forever. This is the sentiment of the southern people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The unfinished business is still before the Senate. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we can not, of course, take action on the unfinished business owing to the agreement to vote on Saturday next. The committee had hoped that some of the Senators who desire to speak on the reciprocity agreement would be ready to go on, because, as the committee is informed, there are a great many speeches to be made, and they hoped that the time would be occupied in that way. I do not know whether there are any Senators who desire to speak this afternoon. If not, Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withhold his motion?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I withhold it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted, if it were in order and if the Senator will withhold the motion, to move that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. LODGE. It can not be set aside temporarily, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. LODGE. As representing the committee, I do not think I ought to consent to that. It seems to me it is an implied part of the unanimous-consent agreement that the reciprocity bill should be kept before the Senate; and if Senators are not ready to go on and no amendments are to be offered, it seems to me that we ought not to set it aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only desire that it be temporarily set aside.

Mr. LODGE. I should not be willing to do that in the absence of Senators who have been discussing the bill that was under consideration this morning, if it is the Senator's purpose to secure the consideration of that bill. I know the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has not concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That will give them an opportunity to come into the Chamber, perhaps, and go on.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether or not they wish to go on. I know the Senator from Idaho has not concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move that the Senate adjourn?

Mr. LODGE. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is demanded.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and will permit my vote, which I have already announced, to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the negative). When I voted I was not aware that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] is absent. I have a pair with him. However, I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BURTON. I have a general pair for to-day with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PAGE. I again announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. CULBERSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 25, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, and (at 1 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 19, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted by the American Medical Association at Los Angeles, Cal., June 26, 1911, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the placing of false statements on food and drug labels, which were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SHIVELY presented resolutions adopted by Polish Turners' Union No. 1, of South Bend, Ind., praying for the passage of the so-called Sulzer resolution providing for an investigation into the present conditions existing at Ellis Island, and also for a revision of the immigration laws, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BRISTOW presented an affidavit in support of the bill (S. 2180) granting a pension to Mildred Rhodes, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GAMBLE:

A bill (S. 3053) granting an increase of pension to Josiah McKirahan (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3054) granting an increase of pension to Josiah H. Gordon (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER:
A bill (S. 3066) for the relief of John Burrows; to the Committee on Claims.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADDRESS OF HON. FRANKLIN MACVEAGH.

Mr. KERN. I have here an interesting address delivered by the present Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Franklin MacVeagh, at Chicago, September 1, 1894, concerning the Wilson bill in connection with the panic of 1893. I should like to have it printed as a Senate document. (S. Doc. No. 69.)
The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be entered. The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.
The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bankhead	Davis	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Foster	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Gamble	Nixon	Stephenson
Bristow	Gronna	Oliver	Stone
Brown	Guggenheim	Overman	Sutherland
Bryan	Heyburn	Page	Swanson
Burnham	Hitchcock	Paynter	Thornton
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Townsend
Chilton	Kern	Perkins	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Pomerene	Williams
Crawford	Lodge	Reed	Works
Culberson	McLean	Root
Cullom	Martin, Va.	Shively

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] in attendance on the Lorimer investigation. I make this announcement for the day.
Mr. BRYAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is engaged in the Lorimer investigating committee. I make this announcement for the day.
Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is detained on the Lorimer investigation.
Mr. CHILTON. My colleague [Mr. WATSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.
Mr. PAGE. I have been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON], who is engaged on the Lorimer investigating committee. I make the announcement for the day.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

TARIFF DUTIES ON WOOL.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer a substitute for House bill 11019, known as the wool bill. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.
Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it would be just as well at this time for me to make an explanation of the provisions of the proposed substitute.
In the first place, I maintain the classification of the three grades of wool as now provided for in the present tariff law.
Instead of a rate of 11 cents per pound on first-class wool in the grease and 12 cents per pound on second-class wool in the grease, the substitute provides a rate of 9 cents per pound on both classes.
In the present law there is no provision made for washed wools of the second class to carry a rate of duty of twice the rate of wool in the grease. The substitute corrects this so that the rates upon wool of the second class shall be the same as on wool of the first class, whether in the grease, washed, or scoured. Wool in the grease, 9 cents per pound; washed wool, 18 cents per pound; and scoured wool, 27 cents per pound, instead of the present rates which are: First-class wool in the grease, 11 cents per pound; washed wool, 22 cents per pound; and scoured wool, 33 cents per pound; second-class wool in the grease, 12 cents per pound; washed wool, 12 cents per pound; and scoured wool, 36 cents per pound. This is to eliminate one of the complaints of the carded woolen manufacturers against the present tariff law, which they claim favors the worsted manufacturers.
On third-class wools, valued at 12 cents per pound or less, the substitute provides a rate of 3 cents per pound instead of 4 cents per pound, the present rate; valued over 12 cents per pound, 6 cents per pound instead of 7 cents per pound.
The "skirting clause," of which so much complaint has been made by the woolgrowers, is eliminated. The woolgrowers claim that 9 cents per pound without the "skirting clause" is as great a protection to wool as 11 and 12 cents per pound is with the "skirting clause," as provided in the present law.
Garnetted waste is removed from paragraph 372, with a rate of 30 cents per pound, to paragraph 373, with a rate of 25 cents per pound.
In the proposed substitute the compensatory duties are levied upon the same principle as in the present law, with many reductions in the additional protective ad valorem duties.
The provision in the present law assessing blankets over 3 yards in length has been eliminated in the proposed substitute.
On women's and children's dress goods, Italian cloths, coat linings, buntings, and goods of similar description the specific duties have been reduced from 11 cents per square yard to 9 cents per square yard.
On clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, the specific rate of duty is 36 cents per pound in the proposed amendment, instead of 44 cents per pound, as in the present law, while the additional protective ad valorem duty is 50 per cent instead of 60 per cent, as in the present law.
Webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and so forth, carry a specific duty of 36 cents per pound, instead of a specific duty of 50 cents per pound, as provided in the present law.
The specific duty per square yard in the proposed substitute on all grades of carpets is reduced one-half, while the protective ad valorem duty remains the same as in the present law. The rate on carpets, woven whole for rooms, oriental, Berlin, and similar rugs is reduced from 10 cents per square foot, the present rate, to 8 cents per square foot.
On druggets and bockings the specific duty per square yard is reduced from 22 cents, present law, to 11 cents.
The rate on mats and matting is reduced from 50 per cent ad valorem, present law, to 40 per cent ad valorem.
Paragraph 395½ is new, which provides that in no case shall any of the articles or fabrics enumerated in this schedule pay a duty greater than is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of 80 per cent. This paragraph prevents any equivalent ad valorem duty of Schedule K exceeding 80 per cent. This provision may be the means of making it very difficult for the manufacturers of exceedingly fine and high-priced cloth to compete with similar foreign-made goods, but it will prevent the enemies of Schedule K from having a chance to point to a few imported cheap, shoddy blankets, carrying an equivalent ad valorem duty under the present law of 165 per cent, and claiming that the blankets which the poor people keep themselves warm with are burdened with that excessive duty.

I was in hopes that a revision of Schedule K would not be undertaken until the Tariff Board had made its report, but it is evident that the Democrats of the House and the Democrats of the Senate, together with a sufficient number of Republican Senators to make a majority of the Senate, have concluded to revise Schedule K at this extra session of Congres without the necessary information that the report of the Tariff Board is intended to furnish. The conclusions as to what the revision should be are before the Senate in the shape of a Democratic House bill and an amendment to the reciprocity bill by Senator LA FOLLETTE. I have no hesitancy in saying that if the Democratic wool bill which passed the House becomes law practically every woolen mill in the United States will be closed. Senator LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the Canadian reciprocity bill will, in my opinion, have the same effect. The Wilson bill gave manufacturers of woolens in this country free wool and a protective duty on manufactured goods but slightly lower than provided for in the amendment offered by Senator LA FOLLETTE. Under the Wilson bill the woolen industry of this country was brought almost to a standstill. Under the La Follette amendment manufacturers of wool are to pay a 40 per cent duty on wool in the grease, with but little advance over the ad valorem rates on manufactured goods provided in the Wilson bill; and I take it that anyone familiar at all with the business will conclude that the result can not be anything but disastrous to the business. If the American woolen mills are closed, the American woolgrower will find that his 40 per cent protection avails him nothing.

The woolen industry of this country is more badly frightened to-day than it was during the passage of the Wilson Act, and the following table will show why:

Tariff measures.	1910—Free wool value at United States custom-house.	Ad valorem or percentage duty on wool.	Ad valorem or percentage duty on cloth.	Net protection to manufacturer, i. e., less the wool duty.
	Cents.		Per cent.	Per cent.
Wilson Act	.....	Free	50	50
Dingley and Payne Acts	$0.186	44.31 per cent	97.11	52.80
Underwood bill	.186	20 per cent	40	20
La Follette bill	.186	40 per cent, first-class wools, including those formerly classified as second-class wools.	60	20

If Senators will examine this table they will find that under the Wilson Act there was 50 per cent net protection to the manufacturer; under the Payne Act there is 52.80 per cent net protection to the manufacturer; under the Underwood bill there would be only 20 per cent net protection to the manufacturer; and under the La Follette amendment there would be only 20 per cent net protection to manufacturers on goods made from first-class wools, and under his reclassification these wools comprise the great bulk of the American production.

The rates in my proposed substitute are as low as I believe it is possible for the American woolen business to exist under, judging from the information that I have in my possession. It may be that in some instances the rates are a little high, and in others the 80 per cent limitation may be a little too low. I shall reserve the right to support changes in any of the rates proposed in my substitute if the Tariff Board produces evidence that would justify the same.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah believe that it is wise at this time to attempt legislation in regard to Schedule K?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe that it is wise to attempt such legislation at this time, and I do not propose to press this substitute, unless it is found necessary to substitute it for some wool bill that has or appears to have a chance of passage at this session of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understood the Senator to say that he was convinced that there were enough Republican votes to join with the Democratic vote in this Chamber to enact wool legislation, so far as this Chamber is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not say that there were enough votes to enact such legislation; I said that it was evident that there were a sufficient number of Senators who had the idea of having some such law passed at this extra session.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator has the information, I wish he would give it to the rest of his Republican colleagues, so that they may be equally informed. Personally, I had hoped that, so far as the Republican side of this Chamber was concerned, legislation in regard to the wool schedule might await the action of the investigation of our Tariff Board, and I had hoped that that was the view of all the Republicans in this Chamber. It appears, however, that I have been mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had followed the discussion of the Canadian reciprocity bill, I think he would admit that there have already enough Republicans announced their position upon this very important matter to insure that a majority of the Senators in this body desire a reduction in the wool schedule. I do not think it is necessary to name the Senators; but they have announced their position on the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I suppose there may be some Republican Senators who might think it wise to reduce the duties in Schedule K, but I doubt very much if there are many of them who deem it wise to reduce the duties in that schedule until they have some scientific evidence as to the details of the reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only judging from statements made upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to ask the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wyoming if they do not think that it was an oversight of the President in omitting wool from the other agricultural products in the reciprocity bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that the substitute which I have introduced is not an administration measure, but is a substitute that I have offered on my own initiative. I have adhered to specific duties rather than ad valorem duties because ad valorem duties always provide the lowest protection to the woolgrower at the time when the price of wool is lowest and when he most needs protection.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me further for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator used the expression that this was not an administration measure. I should like to have the Senator explain the difference between an administration measure and one that is not so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only reason why I made that statement was that in the press this morning I noticed the statement that my proposed substitute to the Underwood wool bill was to be an administration measure. I wish to correct that statement, because, so far as the President is concerned, he knows nothing whatever about the substitute. I state now that I have taken the responsibility myself for the introduction of my proposed substitute.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from Utah if he will not request that his amendment be printed in the RECORD? He has gone into an explanation of the amendment at some length, which, of course, will be in the RECORD, and, naturally enough, there will be requests made for this amendment, together with other matters. I therefore hope the Senator will request that his amendment may be printed in the RECORD. I myself have not before seen or heard of the amendment. Of course, I should like to have it where I can not only see it myself, but where I can send it out to others who are interested.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that my amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. SMOOT to the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, viz: Strike out all after line 9 of the bill, page 1, and insert the following:

SCHEDULE K.—WOOL, AND MANUFACTURES OF.

360. All wools, hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, and other like animals shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into the three following classes:

361. Class 1, that is to say, merino, mestiza, metz, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote, down clothing wools, and wools of like character with any of the preceding, including Bagdad wool, China lamb's wool, Castel Branco, Adrianople skin wool, or butcher's wool, and such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Aires, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, Egypt, Morocco, and elsewhere, and all wools not hereinafter included in classes 2 and 3.

362. Class 2, that is to say, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, down combing wools, Canada long wools or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used, and also hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals.

363. Class 3, that is to say, Donskoi, native South American, Cordova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, Russian camel's hair, and all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Syria, and elsewhere, excepting improved wools hereinafter provided for.

364. The standard samples of all wools which are now or may be hereafter deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be the standards for the classification of wools under this act, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to renew these standards and to make such additions to them from time to time as may be required, and he shall cause to be deposited like standards in other customhouses of the United States when they may be needed.

365. Whenever wools of class 3 shall have been improved by the admixture of merino or English blood from their present character as represented by the standard samples now or hereafter to be deposited in the principal customhouses of the United States, such improved wools shall be classified for duty either as class 1 or as class 2, as the case may be.

366. The duty on wools of the first and second classes which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed; and the duty on wools of the first and second classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the duty to which they would be subjected if imported unwashed. The duty on wools of the third class, if imported in condition for use in carding or spinning into yarns, or which shall not contain more than 8 per cent of dirt or other foreign substance, shall be three times the duty to which they would otherwise be subjected.

367. Unwashed wools shall be considered such as shall have been shorn from the sheep without any cleansing—that is, in their natural condition. Washed wools shall be considered such as have been washed with water only on the sheep's back or on the skin. Wools of the first and second classes washed in any other manner than on the sheep's back or on the skin shall be considered as scoured wool.

368. The duty upon wool of the sheep or hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals, of class 1 and class 2, which shall be imported in any other than ordinary condition, or which has been sorted or increased in value by the rejection of any part of the original fleece, shall be twice the duty to which it would be otherwise subject. The duty upon wool of the sheep or hair of the camel, Angora goat, alpaca, and other like animals of any class which shall be changed in its character or condition for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt or any other foreign substance, shall be twice the duty to which it would be otherwise subject. When the duty assessed upon any wool equals three times or more that which would be assessed if said wool was imported unwashed, the duty shall not be doubled on account of the wool being sorted. If any bale or package of wool or hair specified in this act invoiced or entered as of any specified class, or claimed by the importer to be dutiable as of any specified class, shall contain any wool or hair subject to a higher rate of duty than the class so specified, the whole bale or package shall be subject to the highest rate of duty chargeable on wool of the class subject to such higher rate of duty, and if any bale or package be claimed by the importer to be shoddy, mungo, flocks, wool, hair, or other material of any class specified in this act, and such bale contain any admixture of any one or more of said materials, or of any other material, the whole bale or package shall be subject to duty at the highest rate imposed upon any article in said bale or package.

369. The duty upon all wools and hair of the first and second classes shall be 9 cents per pound.

370. On wools of the third class and on camel's hair of the third class the value whereof shall be 12 cents or less per pound, the duty shall be 3 cents per pound. On wools of the third class and on camel's hair of the third class the value whereof shall exceed 12 cents per pound, the duty shall be 6 cents per pound.

371. The duty on wools on the skin shall be 1 cent less per pound than is imposed in this schedule on other wools of the same class and condition, the quantity and value to be ascertained under such rules as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

372. Top waste, slubbing waste, roving waste, ring waste, 30 cents per pound.

373. Shoddy and garnetted waste, 25 cents per pound; noils, wool extract, yarn waste, thread waste, and all other wastes composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this section, 20 cents per pound.

374. Woolen rags, mungo, and flocks, 10 cents per pound.

375. On combed wool or tops, made wholly or in part of wool or camel's hair, valued at not more than 20 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be two and one-fourth times the duty imposed by this schedule on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class; valued at more than 20 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three and one-third times the duty imposed by this schedule on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class; and in addition thereto, upon all the foregoing, 30 per cent ad valorem.

376. Wool and hair which have been advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, not specially provided for in this section, shall be subject to the same duties as are imposed upon manufactures of wool not specially provided for in this section.

377. On yarns made wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 30 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be two and one-half times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 35 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 30 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three and one-half times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

378. On cloths, knit fabrics, and all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not specially provided for in this section, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three times the duty imposed by this section on a pound of unwashed wool of the first class; valued at above 40 cents per pound and not above 70 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto, upon all the foregoing, 50 per cent ad valorem; valued at over 70 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class and 55 per cent ad valorem.

379. On blankets and flannels for underwear composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not more than 40 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be the same as the duty imposed by this section on 2 pounds of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 30 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 40 cents and not more than 50 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 35 per cent ad valorem. On blankets composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at more than 50 cents per pound, the duty per pound shall be three times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem. Flannels composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at above 50 cents per pound, shall be classified and pay the same duty as women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, and goods of similar character and description provided by this section.

380. On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, and goods of similar description and character of which the warp consists wholly of cotton or other vegetable material, with the remainder of the fabric composed wholly or in part of wool, valued at not exceeding 15 cents per square yard, the duty shall be 5 cents per square yard; valued at more than 15 cents per square yard, the duty shall be 6 cents per square yard; and in addition thereto on all the foregoing valued at not above 70 cents per pound, 50 per cent ad valorem; valued above 70 cents per pound, 55 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That on all the foregoing, weighing over 4 ounces per square yard, the rates of duty shall be 5 per cent less than those imposed by this schedule on cloths.

381. On women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, bunting, and goods of similar description or character composed wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this section, the duty shall be 9 cents per square yard; and in addition thereto on all the foregoing valued at not above 70 cents per pound, 50 per cent ad valorem; valued above 70 cents per pound, 55 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That on all the foregoing, weighing over 4 ounces per square yard, the duty shall be the same as imposed by this schedule on cloths.

382. On clothing, ready-made, and articles of wearing apparel of every description, including shawls whether knitted or woven, and knitted articles of every description made up or manufactured wholly or in part, felts not woven, and not specially provided for in this section, composed wholly or in part of wool, the duty per pound shall be four times the duty imposed by this section on 1 pound of unwashed wool of the first class, and in addition thereto 50 per cent ad valorem.

383. Webbings, gorings, suspenders, braces, bandings, beltings, bindings, braids, galloons, edgings, insertings, flouncings, fringes, gimps, cords, cords and tassels, ribbons, ornaments, laces, trimmings, and articles made wholly or in part of lace, embroideries and all articles embroidered by hand or machinery, head nets, nettings, buttons or barrel buttons or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, and manufactures of wool ornamented with beads or spangles of whatever material composed, any of the foregoing made of wool or of which wool is a component material, whether containing india rubber or not, 36 cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem.

384. Aubusson, Axminster, moquette, and chenille carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, 30 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

385. Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, 30 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

386. Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, 24 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

387. Velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, figured or plain, printed on the warp or otherwise, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, 20 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

388. Tapestry Brussels carpets, figured or plain, and all carpets or carpeting of like character or description, printed on the warp or otherwise, 14 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

389. Treble ingrain, three-ply, and all chain Venetian carpets, 11 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

390. Wool Dutch and two-ply ingrain carpets, 9 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

391. Carpets of every description, woven whole for rooms, and Oriental, Berlin, Aubusson, Axminster, and similar rugs, 8 cents per square foot and 40 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That in the measurement of all mats, rugs, carpets, and similar articles, of whatever material composed, the selvage, if any, shall be included.

392. Druggets and bockings, printed, colored, or otherwise, 11 cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 40 per cent ad valorem.

393. Carpets and carpeting of wool, flax, or cotton, or composed in part of any of them, not specially provided for in this section, and mats, matting, and rugs of cotton, 40 per cent ad valorem.

394. Mats, rugs for floors, screens, covers, hassocks, bedsides, art squares, and other portions of carpets or carpeting, made wholly or in part of wool, and not specially provided for in this section, shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpetings of like character or description.

395. Whenever, in any schedule of this act, the word "wool" is used in connection with a manufactured article, of which it is a component material, it shall be held to include wool or hair of the sheep, camel, goat, alpaca, or other animal, whether manufactured by the woolen, worsted, felt, or any other process.

395½. In no case shall any of the articles or fabrics enumerated in this schedule pay a duty more than is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of 80 per cent.

LOANS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 25) to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, pawnbrokers, and real-estate brokers in the District of Columbia, now on the calendar under Rule IX, be restored to the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made. The Chair hears none.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks on the pending measure, the reciprocity bill, not so much to discuss the merits of the bill as to state my own position with respect to it.

I am not a tariff expert. If I am forced to depend for my information upon what I hear in this Chamber, I am afraid I never will be. I listen to an able and ingenious speech on the other side of the Chamber in favor of a tariff for revenue only or for free trade, and I think my teachings on the tariff may have been all wrong. Then I hear an equally able and ingenious speech on this side of the Chamber in favor of a protective tariff and I am reassured again. I am startled at the vehement, not to say tumultuous, asseveration of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] that a protective tariff is a fraud and a delusion and that the farmers have been hoodwinked into the belief that it is beneficial to them, and I am led to think that maybe a protective tariff is a horrid thing after all. But the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] comes to the rescue, backed by all the other Senators from the Northwest, and indignantly protests that to take off the protective tariff, as between us and Canada only, on farm products will ruin the farmers of America, and I begin to be persuaded again that a protective tariff is the greatest thing on earth. Again I hear the pathetic and earnest appeal of my good friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] for the protection of his constituents from the dire effects of taking off this tariff, and I am torn with conflicting emotions. I follow a running debate between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on the sugar schedule and think that possibly they may know what they are talking and differing about so sharply, and what it all means, and that probably no one else does. But when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] can figure out to a mathematical certainty and to a cent just how much the American farmers will lose by reciprocity with Canada, I begin to hope that sometime I, even I, might be able to accomplish that seemingly impossible feat, and that some day a tariff commission will not be necessary to fix tariff duties just and equitable to all parties.

But through it all and notwithstanding these varied and different opinions, all sincere, I still believe in such a protective tariff as will really protect all industries needing protection, and the protection of wage earners in their right to full and reasonable compensation for their labor.

Mr. President, I am not a politician. I took hope from this that I might make, if not a good Senator, at least a better one on that account. In my innocence I believed that the United States Senate was a place for making laws and not an arena where opposing forces were contending for political advantage.

Even that faith has been somewhat shaken, and I am wondering if I had not better take a course of instruction in practical politics.

Mr. President, in the beginning this was a very simple question. While the action took the form of a bill, to be enacted as a law, it was essentially an agreement between this Nation and Canada. Being a contract or agreement, naturally it could not be changed without the consent of both the parties to it. For this reason the President announced, very properly, that to change it would be to defeat it entirely. That this would be the effect of an amendment is too obvious to need argument to support it. With this knowledge numerous amendments have been offered, changing, taking from, or adding to the bill. By whom are these amendments offered? Why, by the enemies of the measure. What for? Obviously to defeat it. I say obviously, because most if not all of them were proposed amendments, not to this bill, and not as to our relations with Canada only, but of existing general laws affecting our commercial relations with the whole world. They were not appropriate here. They should, it seems to me, be offered as separate bills to amend such existing laws. They were not offered with any hope or expectation that they would be adopted. I say this because, in every instance, I believe, the Senator offering the amendment said in so many words that he knew his amendment would not be adopted. If any such Senator did not say so he knew it to be a fact. Then, why were these amendments offered if not to have them enacted as a part of the law There are but two reasons that I am able to conceive of. One is to discredit and finally defeat the bill; the other to make a record in favor of some party or individual Senators who might vote for them, or against some party or individual Senators who might vote against them.

Mr. President, it is this situation, forced into this controversy by amendments of this kind, that has made it seem necessary for me to make known my attitude toward this measure by something more than a mere vote upon it. I have voted against these amendments because I am in favor of the bill, and the amendments, if adopted, can do nothing more than jeopardize its finally becoming an agreement between this country and Canada. I have opposed the amendments, also, because this is not the place for such amendments. Most of them are in no sense proper or appropriate as an amendment to the pending bill. If some of them were offered as separate bills to amend existing laws, dealing with the tariff, generally, or as substitutes for existing laws, I have no doubt I would support some if not all of them. But it is not only inappropriate, but I think distinctly unfair, to urge them as amendments to the pending bill.

There is another reason against these amendments at this time that should appeal to Senators on this side of the Chamber. The platform of the Republican Party declares in favor of a tariff equal to the difference between the cost of production here and abroad and a reasonable profit to the producer. State platforms generally, including my own, have declared in favor of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission to determine, as near as may be, what this difference is as a basis for fixing tariff rates. It is true a permanent tariff commission has not yet been provided for, but we have such a temporary commission. It is at work now, I am informed, on some of the schedules, and we are promised a report on at least one of the important schedules by the meeting of the regular session of Congress, in December next. Nothing can be gained by the Republican Party or by any individual Republican by breaking these pledges. It seems to me, Mr. President, that to press these amendments to the general tariff laws at this time is inconsistent with the pledges of the party if they are offered with the view of having them adopted and passed.

Mr. President, I said in the beginning that it was not my purpose so much to discuss the merits of the reciprocity agreement as to state my own position. The main question has been fully discussed by Senators much more familiar with the immediate question and with tariff laws and their effects generally than I am. I expect to vote for the bill because I believe it will bring us just this much nearer to a free and untrammeled trade with this near neighbor of ours, which, I believe, will be beneficial to the people of this country as a whole. The relations of the two countries are so close and intimate in all other respects, separated, as they are, by an imaginary line only, that it seems natural and for the best interests of all concerned that mutual and reciprocal trade relations should be established between them. This bill is a step in that direction. I am only sorry that it does not go further than it does. I should regret exceedingly to see this bill passed if it is going to work any permanent injury to the farmers of this country or of any of the States. I do not believe that it will have any such effect. It may possibly cause some temporary disturbance of trade in States bordering on the Canadian line, but I do not believe it will do more than that. I think the supposed injury to the American farmer has, in the zeal of opposition, been greatly exaggerated.

Mr. President, it has been attempted to cast discredit upon the bill by the assertion that the Democrats of Congress are supporting it for purely partisan or political reasons and not from conviction that it is a just or righteous measure. If this be so it does not concern me. If the bill is a just one and should pass I am only glad that the political exigencies of the occasion have drawn members of the Democratic Party to support it. They are welcome to all the political advantage that they assume will accrue to their party by their support of a measure that originated with a Republican President.

On the other hand, it is asserted that Senators on this side of the Chamber are supporting the bill not from conviction but because the President desires to have it become a law and is using his influence and the power of his office to secure its passage. I am just as little concerned with the motives of Senators on this side for giving the measure their support. The question that controls me is whether the measure is right or not and that alone. In that I may be mistaken. In the face of the conflicting and varied views of Senators as to this question I can only exercise my best judgment.

If the President of the United States were in fact using the power of his great office beyond the mode and means provided by the Constitution to influence the Senate or any Member of it to support this bill it would be a matter of the gravest concern.

The President has the right and it is his duty to recommend to Congress by message the enacting of such legislation as he deems to be for the public good, and to veto such enactments as he believes to be wrong or detrimental. There, in my judgment, his right and his duty ceases. This is so clear to me that I can not conceive of the President doing more than this to secure the passage of any bill. The independence of the legislative department of the Government is absolutely necessary if our form of government is to be preserved. Any violation of this independence or encroachment upon its rights, privileges, and obligations as an independent branch of the Government should be promptly resented by Congress and its prerogatives strictly and jealously guarded and protected. This is so clear that I can not conceive of the President encroaching upon these prerogatives of an independent branch of the Government. When the time comes, if it ever does, when a bill can be passed in this body through the influence of the executive department and without the independent assenting judgment of a majority of its Members, the time will have come when the Senate of the United States should be abolished.

I have no desire or disposition to condemn or criticize the President. To do so would not injure him, but would inevitably react upon me. I attribute to him the same honesty and sincerity of purpose that I claim for myself, whether we agree or not. Nothing can be gained by personal attacks on individuals. Personal abuse or criticism is not argument. Any reform movement founded on malice or hatred can not long stand. The attempt to sustain any movement or measure by attacking individuals or imputing wrong motives to others is bound to bring weakness and not strength. Injustice toward one's opponents can not advance any cause or measure, however just and right it may be. The thing to do is to prove that it is just and right. Nothing else is necessary and nothing else will succeed. If we are going to preserve this Nation as a free and independent Government and establish and maintain the principles upon which it was founded, we must get above the influence of petty personal or partisan spite or malice and consider this and all other questions on the broad ground of right and justice.

The President of the United States, as an American citizen, has the right to express his views, unofficially, on any matter of public interest, the same as any other citizen. If he should go beyond that and attempt to use the power of his great office to influence legislation, his act would be a dangerous and unwarranted encroachment upon the Constitution in its letter and spirit. No such charge should be made against him except upon the clearest and most convincing proof. The present incumbent of the office of President is too good a lawyer not to recognize these constitutional limitations upon his power, and I assume he is too good a citizen to overstep them. When he expresses his views on any question, as a citizen, they should have just the same weight as the expressed views of any other equally well informed and equally reliable citizen—no more, no less. For myself, I am trying to consider this bill on its merits as it appeals to my judgment. Whether the President wants it or does not want it enacted has nothing whatever to do with my actions. Whether its passage shall help or hurt any political party or branch of any party or the political aspirations of any individual is of just as little consequence to me and carries just as little weight. I have voted against the amendments offered for the same reason and upon the same principle.

I shall vote for this bill because I believe it is right and just and for the public good.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am admonished by Senators this morning that they desire to be heard upon this measure before the vote, which by agreement will be taken Saturday, and they are fearful lest they be crowded out of that opportunity. I desire to be governed somewhat by their wishes in the matter, and I shall therefore confine myself very closely to the notes I have prepared upon this bill.

Mr. President, there may be some doubt as to whether a man is justified at this stage in the debate in taking any of the time of the Senate in discussing the bill, but I feel that there has been so much conversation in the Senate already against the bill that I owe to myself, and to those people whom I am trying to represent, to undertake to keep some of my Republican brethren from making a mistake. I want to tell them the truth about the provisions of this bill, so that if they do go wrong they can not have the excuse afterwards of saying they did not know any better. And, Mr. President, in my short discussion I expect to discuss the bill. I will not have time to go out and abuse and denounce people; I will not have time to quarrel with my erring colleagues here; but I intend, if I can, in a simple and direct fashion, to get down to the meat in the pending proposition and to find out what it will do for the American people.

To reach that result it is necessary to reflect for a moment that the American people have been in the habit for a century and more of making a fight to improve their Government, of making a fight to make successful a republican form of government. They have never been satisfied with the progress they have attained. It is an American trait to struggle always to make things better.

This bill is simply one of the steps in the struggle of the American people to obtain a better governmental policy, a fairer arrangement under which the industries of this country may operate, an effort to give fuller and fairer justice to all the people of this country.

That struggle has been maintained for a century and more, and a good share of it has been taken up with this phase of it—that is, the tariff phase.

I do not intend to go into the discussion of the tariff proposition—the relative merits of protection and free trade—because I do not think it is necessary at this time, but I desire to call to the attention of the Senate a few facts, in order that we may understand this bill, why it is here, and what relation it bears to recent political history and recent congressional legislation on this subject.

Mr. President, the American people profit from experience. They have been engaged in the struggle of making successful a republican form of government for more than a century. While they may have made mistakes and short periods may have elapsed when there was little to show for improvement and progress, the fact remains that their fight through all the decades has resulted on the whole in wonderful and permanent progress. Every State in the Union has better laws than it had during the first 10 years of its statehood. The Nation to-day has better laws on its statute books than it ever had before. Notwithstanding all this progress and this advance, the American people have never for a moment been, nor are they to-day, satisfied and contented with either past or present achievements. In other words, American people are determined to continue the struggle for better things and higher standards. It would be a dark day for America if her people ever became so satisfied with their conditions that they refused to make any further effort to improve or better them. To my mind the fact that they have achieved so much is due largely to this trait of the American character to move upward as well as onward.

The measure before us is a tariff bill pure and simple. It is more than that; it is a progressive tariff bill—it leads the way to lower duties. It is not general as to all countries, because it applies to but one; it is not general as to all articles of commerce, because it applies to comparatively few articles of commerce. In giving it our consideration, it seems to me we have a right to profit from the testimony and from the facts presented during the consideration of the tariff act of 1909. Without regard to the merits of the law passed in that year by Congress convened in extraordinary session, it must be conceded that the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law taught the American people one great and enduring lesson. That act is a general tariff law. It applies to all countries and touches all articles of commerce. I remember as if it were yesterday the heat and the intensity and the learning exhibited in the consideration of that measure in this body. You will recall with me in a general way the difficulties we had. Here was the President at the White House, who in public speech and in print and in message to Congress had taken the position that revision of tariff duties was needed, because, generally speaking, they were too high, and that the American people were entitled to a reduction of those duties. During that session the President of the United States contented himself with a formal recommendation to Congress on the subject. He was indeed so jealous in behalf of the prerogatives of the legislative branch of the Government that during the pendency of the bill before it passed the Senate he studiously avoided interfering with the work of Congress on the subject before it.

Indeed, those who criticize him now for asserting his own judgment with respect to the pending bill must concede that he was not a usurper of legislative functions during that session, a charge which they lay at his door now. At that time he assumed, apparently, as he had a right to do, that Congress would do its full duty toward the American people and would pass a law in conformity with the demands of the public welfare and in harmony with the promises of the party which had elected him. At any rate, he left Congress unmolested and alone while that bill was under consideration. Here in the Senate, after the bill came to us, as you remember, it was discussed at great length and with great detail and with great liberty by Senators representing conflicting views as to what the particular rates of duty should be. You will remember the amendments that were offered to reduce the cotton and woolen schedules by the late distinguished and much beloved Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver—amendments all designed, so I thought at that time and believe now, to reduce the duties to a reasonable basis. I was glad to vote for them all You will remember the series of amendments offered by the present distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on the iron and steel schedules—amendments all designed to remove the excesses contained in the old law and to put that industry on a sane and reasonable and just tariff basis. I was glad to vote for those amendments. You will remember the amendments offered by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] touching the woolen schedule, as well as many other amendments on other schedules. All of which appeared to me to be right and to do no injury to any industry, and to all of which I was very glad to lend the support of my vote.

It is unnecessary to particularize at length; it is sufficient to recall that these and other Senators offered amendments, all designed to reduce duties, on the theory that the duties proposed by the committee and the duties contained in the old law were excessive, and therefore unnecessary; extortionate, and therefore unjust; and in supporting all these amendments no Senator in this body enjoyed greater satisfaction than I. I believed then, as I do to-day, that whenever a duty is unnecessary it should be removed, and whenever a duty is excessive it should be reduced. I shall never give my consent to the doctrine which demands a duty that is either unnecessary or excessive.

And yet in that struggle here in the Senate you will recall that scarcely a single one of those proposed amendments received the votes to which it was entitled; not because votes were not in this body sufficient to carry some, or all of them, if they had been standing on their own merits, but because some Senators did not feel at liberty to vote for those reductions on those schedules for fear it would result in lowering the duties on a schedule in which their particular State or locality or people was interested. In other words, it was impossible to command the support of a lumber State for a reduction on the woolen or cotton schedule, because the lumber State was interested in the lumber industry, and she could not afford—at least her delegation seemed to act on that assumption—to strike the woolen schedule for fear of the effect it might have on the lumber schedule. And so, in States where iron ore is paramount, some men hesitated about voting for reductions of duties on some other article for fear it might result in the reduction of the duty on iron ore.

The final result was that when the bill finally passed the Senate it did not represent in all particulars the conviction of a single Senator who voted for it; not one. The bill when finished was the result not of the steam-roller process, but of the logroller process, the worst and most constant menace in every legislative body, whether State or national. If the American people can not have laws enacted which will be able to stand or fall on their own merits, but are compelled to take such laws as shall result from a logrolling combination of different factions or different interests, the time is not far distant when a heavy penalty must be paid by those who are now responsible to the people of the United States.

Now, this was the lesson—to my mind of greater value than all else learned by the American people and ought not to be forgotten by the American Senate—the lesson that tariff duties should be fixed in accordance with what is right and just as to each duty and not as decreed by logrolling combinations of conflicting interests. It was out of this lesson that grew the suggestion that the scientific and sensible way to fix tariff duties which should be just was to fix them a schedule at a time and let each duty stand on its own merits unaffected by any other duty clamoring for favorable consideration.

But, as I said before, the bill finally passed the Senate. I am glad it passed the Senate and was sent to the House, so far as I am individually concerned, with my vote recorded against it, because I did not believe then and do not believe now that it was as good a bill as it was the duty of the Senate to pass. But the Senate thought differently and passed it, and it went to the House and to conference. You will recall the President of the United States undertook to use his influence with the conference committee to win the fight for lower duties which we had fought and lost in the United States Senate. He did not succeed, unfortunately, to the fullest extent, but he did succeed to some extent.

It will be remembered that the debate and the struggle of that session of the Senate hovered around the lumber schedule, the iron schedule, the oil schedule, the woolen schedule, and the cotton schedule—chiefly around those great industries. The President was not able in the conference to reduce the cotton and woolen schedules, but he was able to reduce the lumber schedule from $1.50 to $1.25 a thousand; he was able to reduce the boot and shoe schedule materially; he was able to reduce the duty on leather and harness. He was able to revise downward my good friend from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], my good friend from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and myself on the hide schedule, for, as I remember it, we all voted for the duty on hides when it was before the Senate. We were a unit on putting lumber on the free list—none of our States produce lumber—but we were a unit in keeping the duty on hides; that was the chief manufacturing industry we had. He reduced the duty on boots and shoes, leather and harness, and iron ore; he effected many other reductions, and the bill came back from conference. I voted for the conference report because I believed where we had wholly failed he had partially succeeded. The American people were entitled to have these reductions which were made from the old law, and I shall never raise my voice in this Chamber to vote against a bill which affords the least possible help to my people, whether the bill is entirely satisfactory or not. I will do all I can with my colleagues here to get the bill right, but after the bill is made, if it is an improvement on the old law, although it is not right in all its parts, I expect to vote for it rather than to keep the old law.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. The only point I want to make in referring to it is the fact that out of that law grew the determination of many people and of many Senators to embrace the first opportunity which should present itself to fix tariff duties by schedule or by subject rather than by the old logrolling plan which has been in vogue ever since the country has been doing business. With this notion firmly fixed in my own mind and heart I welcomed the resolution introduced by the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] last winter looking to an amendment of the rules which should provide that method for revising the tariff, and I listened enthusiastically and patiently to his earnest and elaborate argument in support of it. I did not need to be convinced, because I was already convinced; but if I had been in doubt there was no escape from the logic of his argument that the American people are entitled to have these duties fixed separately and independently and on the basis of fact, on the basis of the cost of production, on the basis of the public welfare, and not on the basis of logrolling through a measure which would help an aggregation of friendly but different interests. I regret that the Committee on Rules did not report his amendment, but it was not reported, and we are here to-day without it to control and help us.

But, in the meantime, after the Payne-Aldrich tariff law went into effect there was a provision in the statute, you will remember, that made it the duty of the President to determine whether the maximum or minimum rate fixed in the law should go into effect in the different countries. By that law he was not only authorized, but commanded, to investigate the conditions of trade and the conditions of commerce between the countries, so that he might determine under the provisions of the law whether this or that country was entitled to the high or low rate.

He proceeded under this provision of law to adjust these different rates, and I am glad to know to-day that in the adjustment on his investigation and on his motion the mimimum rate fixed in the law was applied to every country doing business with the United States. The American people were saved the burden of the maximum rate as to any country on the globe. In his investigation it appears from communications sent to Congress and communications from experts authorized to assist him that as to Canada there is practically and substantially no difference in the cost of production. When that fact appeared he had a right to confer with the Canadian authorities and to negotiate a tentative agreement, which he did, under and through which unnecessary duties might be in a measure removed. He reported the tentative agreement to Congress and recommended it to our favorable consideration. He did not report the agreement to one Congress; he reported it to two Congresses. The Congress preceding the present one had this agreement before it, had it for days and weeks, and discussed it at great length. The newspapers, periodicals, and magazines all discussed it. Its provisions were in detail given to the American public and the people knew just what the proposed contract as recommended by the President was. It was given full publicity. The House was Republican when it was first recommended to Congress, and a Republican House, after debate and consideration, passed it by a vote of about 3 to 1. It came to the Senate of the United States on the 15th day of last February, about three weeks before adjournment.

I will not recall the tragedy of its burial in the Senate of the United States at that time, except to remark that, in my judgment, there was no excuse for the Senate of the United States refusing at the last session to vote on the bill. If it was a bad measure we had the power and the opportunity to kill it; if it was a good measure, we had the power and opportunity to pass it. Why did we refuse to do either?

You criticize the President of the United States because he called this extraordinary session to consider the bill. You ought not to criticize him; it is the Senate that deserves the criticism. The President of the United States is not responsible for the extra session. It was a stubborn and a loquacious Senate that was responsible for the extra session. He had a right to negotiate the agreement, and those who contend to the contrary forget the provision in the Constitution which expressly empowers him and makes it his duty to recommend to Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. Does anyone here contend that the power to recommend does not include the power to urge? Does anyone here contend that the power to recommend does not include an obligation to stand by the recommendation? I apprehend no Senator here will make any such contention, but it will be contended, as it already has been, that the Chief Executive encroached on the prerogatives and powers of the legislative branch of the Government when he negotiated the agreement with Canada in the first place, and since its negotiation has taken so active an interest in its journey through Congress. Again these critics forget the provision of the Constitution which makes the Executive a very large part of the legislative branch of the Government, and when we extol our own greatness and emphasize the exclusiveness of our legislative powers we forget that under the Constitution we are without power to pass by a majority vote a single statute.

We might pass laws here from sunup till sundown by a majority vote and they are as though they had never been written if the President of the United States disapproves them. Under our form of government the legislative powers are not exclusively in the hands of Congress. For one I want to say here and now that I honor the day when any President of the United States asserts his legislative as well as his executive power. Instead of condemning the Executive for his assertion of legislative prerogative, which the Constitution gives him, he ought to be condemned for his failure to assert it. In this connection permit me to call your attention to the fact that among all the great Presidents of this Republic, from the time of Washington to the present date, those Presidents were greatest who exercised to the fullest their legislative as well as their executive power. The reason for that is the legislative branch of the Government, for some reason or other, has been the one branch of our Government which has been a disappointment to the people who own the Government. The people of the country have depended in every emergency, and most times without disappointment, upon the force and the character and the initiative of the Executive. You can read the records of Congress, that we print at public expense, containing our speeches and a record of other minor incidents, and you will seldom find—there may be some exceptions—a single Congress which on adjournment day deserved or received the applause and the appreciation of the people. It seems to me that now in considering this measure, which affects all the people of the United States, that we could well afford to give more attention to the measure itself, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], who preceded me, and less attention to denouncing its author, the President. This is not the proper time nor place to play either personal or party politics.

With the suggestion of the Senator from California upon that subject I agree entirely. We do discredit to our institutions when we stop in considering legislative matters to inject the party fortunes of any organization or of any man into the debate.

I wish to say while I am on this subject that the Senator from California and myself are not alone in taking this view. I hold in my hand an editorial from one of the prominent and very highly respected magazines of the country. It is not a newspaper, and therefore it will not be subject to the wave of the hand that is made by some Senators that the newspapers are supporting the bill purely out of selfish motives, because under the provisions of this act magazines of this class do not get the benefit of the provisions with reference to paper. Here is the editorial. I will not have time to read it all. It was published under date of July 1 of this year.

Mr. WARREN. In what magazine?

Mr. BROWN. In the Outlook. After discussing the vote in the Senate where, it will be remembered, a number of Republicans joined our Democratic friends in instructing the Committee on Finance to report the other tariff measures by July 10, the Outlook comes to the point to which I desire to call your attention:

> But if the coalition—
>
> Referring to the vote I have just mentioned—
> means that the insurgents are either playing a political game for their own advantage or are trying to defeat Canadian reciprocity by putting the purely Democratic tariff-revision measures to the front, the country will not be slow to disapprove. The plain duty of the Senate is to put the Canadian reciprocity bill first in order of importance, and either to put it also first in the time order or at least to make sure that it is not held back seriously by other legislation. We do not mean by this that Republican Senators are bound to vote for the bill as a party measure regardless of their own beliefs. But they are bound in political good faith to give a full hearing and prompt action on a measure resulting from the efforts of a Republican administration, a measure to consider which was the prime object in the calling of the present special session. Moreover, the present feeling as to tariff revision is that one thing should be done at a time, and, logically, the reciprocity bill, having advanced to its present stage, should be disposed of one way or the other—and that it should be passed is the earnest conviction of the Outlook—before the several schedules are taken up one by one.

Now, listen to this:

> To attach the wool tariff bill or the so-called farmers' free-list bill to the reciprocity bill as amendments would be a palpable attempt to avoid precisely that responsibility which is directly facing the Senate. Fortunately, it seems not at all unlikely that the sentiment of Democratic Senators will be opposed to that course, even if it is urged upon them by their insurgent Republican colleagues.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is that a signed editorial?

Mr. BROWN. No; it is not.

Mr. BORAH. I regret that it is not. It might have been different if signed by a certain one of their special editors.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose that the management of the magazine would not disown the editorial. It simply emphasizes the point which was made by the Senator who preceded me and the one I was trying to make, that we are here to-day and have been here for months at this session and had an opportunity for weeks at the last session to consider and pass upon this measure, which relates to a few schedules and to one country, and we ought to do it like men. We ought to look the provisions squarely in the face. If those provisions are inimical to the public interest, let us defeat them; and if they are right and would result in the public good, let us pass them.

The bill is here, and it may be proper to observe and to remember—even though some of our friends say the President has no power to negotiate the treaty or agreement—the pending bill which is before us, and which we must pass or defeat, was introduced by a Member of the House of Representatives in the present Congress. It may be well to remember that it took the usual course in that body; it went to the Committee on Ways and Means, was reported back, was discussed by the legislative body, and was passed by an overwhelming majority. It came here in the usual and constitutional course of legislation. It was not met at the threshold by a denial of admission on the ground that the President had suggested the law. It met the same recognition that every other law from the House receives. It was sent to the Committee on Finance; the committee had hearings. It came back from the committee with an amendment written into the body of the bill. No reason was given by the committee why the amendment should be adopted—not one—nor was any reason given why the bill should be either passed or rejected—not one.

Before considering in detail the pending measure, I want to express my grief, my profound grief, because it does not have the support of some of my friends in this body whom I know at heart are in favor of lower duties. I do not complain of them. I do not charge them with insincerity, because I know them to be sincere.

But, Mr. President, I simply can not understand them. It is beyond my comprehension to appreciate how in one session of Congress I could vote for lower duties and in the next session of Congress I could favor a revision of the tariff a schedule at a time, and at a third session of Congress be against this proposition, which, while it is not a revision of a single schedule, it is a revision of a few schedules, not with all the countries of the world, but with one country; a plan that I firmly believe marks the beginning of the end of extortionate tariff duties in this country. In my judgment, Mr. President, the moment this bill becomes a law the fight which was begun in 1909 for lower duties has been won in 1911. No man with candor, no man with his eyes open, face to face with events present and pending, can escape the conviction that with this bill passed other bills will follow which materially will lessen the burdens that the public carry. In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to congratulate Democracy. I have had a somewhat personal acquaintance with that party for more than 20 years, but during that time, from my point of view, I have found it uniformly and consistently and constantly on the wrong side of nearly every public question. It is with the deepest pleasure that I congratulate the Democratic Party in the year 1911 on having the moral courage and patriotism to support and to sustain a Republican President in passing a bill which means much for the people of the United States. I am glad it is able to rise above the consideration of party expediency in an effort to promote the public welfare.

Mr. President, I am convinced that the enactment of the pending bill will result in larger trade with Canada in all the products produced and manufactured in the United States, thereby stimulating American industry to the great advantage of both the agricultural and manufacturing classes. I understand perfectly well how easy it is to dispute this proposition by simply joining in the chorus that it takes the duty off of all the products the farmer sells and leaves the duty on the things he buys. I understand perfectly well how easy it would be for me to oppose the removal of any duty on the things that the farmers of my State produce. Indeed, the temptation to do the easy thing instead of the right thing is sometimes very great. I contend that if some men would think more of the farmer's welfare and less of the farmer's vote their criticism of the bill would be less acrimonious.

This bill, as you know, removes the duty on farm products. If I believed the duties on farm products were in any measure, however slight, protective in their character, I should oppose their removal. But it seems to me that the duty on corn, for example, is not a protective duty. It does not affect in any way the prosperity of the corn industry in this country. It has not affected it, because we are on an export basis when we come to market our corn products. So long as the corn raiser is compelled to meet in competition the corn of the world no duty on corn can be any protection to him against the corn raiser of the world. The American and foreign producers of corn are in competition now and always will be so long as this country raises more corn than it consumes. To my mind the question is not debatable with reference to corn, and I think the same rule applies and the same law governs, generally speaking, all the other agricultural products.

The duty on wheat, like the duty on corn, is not protective in character at all, and no one to my knowledge in the debates on the tariff question has ever argued until recently that the duty on wheat was directly to the advantage of the wheat grower.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REED in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator say the duty on wheat is not indirectly beneficial to the wheat raiser?

Mr. BROWN. I said it was not directly beneficial.

Mr. BORAH. I know it has been contended that it was not directly beneficial, but does the Senator contend that it is not indirectly beneficial to the wheat raiser?

Mr. BROWN. The duty on wheat?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all. The duty on wheat is not protective in character in the slightest degree, and I will undertake to demonstrate that if the Senator will be patient.

Mr. BORAH. I am possessed of patience; but does the Senator contend that it has never had any beneficial effect to the farmer?

Mr. BROWN. I contend that the duty on wheat has never been protective at any season when we have had a surplus of wheat in this country, and for decades we have always had a surplus.

Mr. BORAH. Well, then——

Mr. BROWN. During the political life of my friend and myself there has never been the slightest advantage to the wheat grower of America on account of the duty on wheat.

Mr. BORAH. And that has been true as to all other farm products, I presume?

Mr. BROWN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand, then, that the Senator contends that that is true with reference to all farm products?

Mr. BROWN. All farm products, generally speaking.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if the Senator does not want to be interrupted, I will allow him to go on.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BROWN. With pleasure, I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. When the Senator says that the tariff on wheat has had no appreciable difference in the American wheat market, I desire to ask did the Senator hear the speeches of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and of his colleague, the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and the speech of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] on that phase of this question?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; I heard those speeches.

Mr. DIXON. Did the Senator ever read the actual market reports showing a difference of 10 cents a bushel——

Mr. BROWN. I have read the market reports, and I have some of the market reports here.

Mr. DIXON. Showing a difference of 10 cents a bushel between the Minneapolis and the Winnipeg markets?

Mr. BROWN. I have the market reports showing a difference in favor of Winnipeg, as well as against Winnipeg at the time——

Mr. DIXON. Not in recent years.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; for this year; and that is quite recent.

Mr. DIXON. Since the reciprocity bill has been pending, I admit the Winnipeg market has gone up about 5 cents a bushel as compared with the Minneapolis market, but that was not the case before that time.

Mr. BROWN. I will demonstrate this proposition by the best authority, if Senators will give me an opportunity to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROWN. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. What does the Senator think has been the object of the organization of which he is a leading member in putting these duties upon farm products ever since we have been a party?

Mr. BROWN. That can be answered in several ways. The fact is that when the original tariff law was enacted there was a duty put on everything. We let no industry escape. It was put there and left there. The present duty on wheat is a relic of the Dark Ages.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that Alexander Hamilton's report was the beginning of the Dark Ages?

Mr. BROWN. I think Alexander Hamilton's tariff notions were the beginning of the tariff system.

Mr. BORAH. And Hamilton recommended a duty upon farm products.

Mr. BROWN. I think he did; yes.

Mr. BORAH. And the Republican Party has advocated the policy from the time of its organization until now.

Mr. BROWN. The Republican Party has advocated a protective-tariff system which should provide a duty which would protect every industry that needed protection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Republican Party has advocated——

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I shall object to the Senator, during my time, putting in another day of the speech he has already made.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask one more question.

Mr. BROWN. I will be glad to answer any question.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask one more question and I will not again interrupt the Senator. Is the Senator, during the course of his speech, going to discuss the attitude of the Republican Party toward duties upon farm products in the past?

Mr. BROWN. I am going to discuss the attitude of the Republican Party toward the entire system.

Mr. BORAH. And toward farm products in particular?

Mr. BROWN. Including farm products.

Mr. BORAH. And why the Republican Party has advocated these duties during the past?

Mr. BROWN. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the duty on wheat, as I remarked before, like the duty on corn, is not protective in character at all. The wheat of our country is to-day in competition with the wheat of the world, including not Canada alone, but Russia and every other wheat-producing country. It matters not where the point of competition is so long as the wheat growers of our country are compelled to be in competition with wheat growers of other countries. Our surplus, whether it be great or small, is forced to seek a foreign market, and so long as any surplus remains the foreign and the home market must always be approximately on the level. The logic of this is unanswerable. If the price at home for a bushel of wheat is higher than it is abroad, every sane man knows that no bushel of wheat will go abroad. Its owner will take the home price and save the transportation charges of sending it out of the country, and there would be no surplus. This is the natural law of business, which the farmers of the country recognize and which every candid and sane man must concede to exist. There never has been and never will be a bushel of wheat exported if the American home price is higher than the foreign price. When you accept this law and admit the fact, which must be admitted, that there has not been a year for decades when we did not export wheat, we must conclude that our wheat growers are on an export basis, and therefore the duty on wheat does not directly affect its price and is in no degree protective in character.

But, Mr. President, I am not compelled to rely on the logic of these facts alone to sustain the conclusion that the price of wheat is not affected by the duty on wheat. I purpose to sustain the conclusion by distinguished and illustrious precedent and authority. I shall quote no authority but that of the highest character; and I challenge my Republican colleagues on the floor who differ with me about the merits of this bill to point to a single public utterance ever made by a Republican President, or a declaration of the Republican Party ever made in national convention, or any statement ever made during the last 40 years up to 2 years ago by a Republican statesman wherein it is claimed or hinted that a duty on any agricultural product of which America has an annual surplus was ever protective in the slightest degree. The farmer of this country has never entertained the notion, and does not now entertain the notion, that a duty on the commodities which he produces and which are produced in excess of the demands of our people, and are thereby forced to a foreign market to compete with the products of the world, is protective or has anything to do with fixing the price of his commodity at the elevator where he sells and delivers his grain.

Let me read you the testimony and the judgment of experts on the question as to whether or not the duty on wheat and agricultural products generally affects the price of those products.

The first witness I want to put upon the stand is the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to proceed now, and afterwards I will be glad to yield to him? Secretary Wilson in his communication, which is now Senate document 820, in speaking of this question said:

The United States produce surplus wheat above domestic requirements. This surplus production is sold in foreign countries. The price of our exported surplus is governed by the world's requirements, being regulated by the law of supply and demand, and the price of wheat in the United States while we are exporting is governed by the price at which the surplus is sold, as a general proposition. Occasionally wheat corners may interfere with the law of supply and demand and temporarily affect the price.

Mr. President, Secretary Wilson ought to be competent authority on this question. Of course, he does not enjoy the distinction of being a Member of the Senate, and therefore perhaps is not entitled to quite so much consideration; but, Mr. President, I propose now to call a few witnesses from the body of the Senate on this question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator permit me to finish this point before I leave it?

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to read a statement that Mr. Wilson made during the campaign, so that it might be placed side by side with that statement. They would look well together.

Mr. OLIVER. I make the point of order against that, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. I would be glad to have the Senator from Idaho make the statement in his own time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. BROWN. I read first from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-first Congress, first session, page 3636. This is a record of the proceedings of the Senate on the 22d day of June, 1909. In the course of the debate on that day on the tariff bill, among other things, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] said:

The wheat acreage to-day is producing a surplus of wheat which must be thrown into the world's market, thereby keeping down the price of the home product, tariff or no tariff.

The testimony of the Senator from North Dakota, it seems to me, sustains Secretary Wilson and sustains the point I am making, that so long as we have a surplus the tariff can not affect the price. But that is only one senatorial witness. I have another here. In the same RECORD I find a discussion between the senior Senator from Idaho and the present senior Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Idaho addressed the following question to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]:

Does the Senator believe that the duty on wheat affects the price of wheat?

The answer of the Senator from Iowa was clear and distinct and was given in the three words:

I do not.

Further along in the debate the distinguished Senator from Iowa tendered the following observation:

We are as firmly wedded to the doctrine of protection as is the Senator from Idaho. We believe that the system of protection does have a great deal to do with the price of everything sold in this country, but we do not believe that the duty on bacon and ham has anything to do with the price of hogs, because we—I am speaking now of Iowa—are the largest exporters of the products of hogs of any State of the Union. Therefore I want to know whether the Senator, down in his heart, believes that this duty on bacon and ham has affected or can affect in any way the market value of hogs, because I am sure the farmers of my State have never been deluded by any such notion.

On the 11th day of June, 1909, the distinguished witness, whom I now have on the stand, expressed himself again on the subject. He said:

I do not believe that we in Iowa receive any direct benefit for the 400,000,000 bushels of corn that we raise every year. I do not believe that we receive any direct benefit from the duty on the eight or ten million hogs that we market every year. I do not believe that of the $700,000,000 of agricultural products that we pour every year into the channels of trade protection advances the price of a tithe of them.

I want Senators to remember that I come from a State which probably put more in value into the channels of trade every year than any State in the Union in agricultural products. We will this year supply the people of the United States and the people of the world with a product that will surpass in value $700,000,000, and it is idle for even an enthusiast to assert that the price of these products is directly affected by the protective tariff.

We are benefited, however, and I want, in passing, to acknowledge the benefit, for I am just as firm a believer in the policy of saving our markets as one who may live in New England, New York, or California; we are benefited because protection creates a great prosperous multitude of men and women and children in America who buy our products, who are able to buy them, and who are able to pay for them.

Mr. President, this testimony comes from a distinguished Senator, representing one of the greatest agricultural States out of our splendid sisterhood of States, with an annual product of agricultural products worth nearly $1,000,000,000 poured annually into the channels of trade, much of it shipped out of the State, and some of it to other countries. This champion of his people—and he is a faithful and able representative and defender of his people's interests—two years ago told the American people, as well as this Senate, that the duty on these products was of no substantial value in affecting the price.

But there are other witnesses. I will not be able to read from them all, but they are of such high character and so unimpeachable that I am constrained to read from one or two more.

Mr. President, permit me to offer another authority to sustain my contention that any article produced in this country in excess of the home demand is not affected in price by the duty on the article.

On the 10th day of May, 1909, the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], in reply, I think, to an interrogatory from the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], said:

I do not recall the millions of bushels produced in the State of Minnesota, but I desire to tell the Senator that the tariff on wheat which is on the statute books has not done us a particle of good. It would be like a tariff on cotton, because up to this time we have been exporting from 150,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. The price of our wheat is fixed by the Liverpool price—the export price—and no duty up to this time has helped us.

Mr. President, I am going to call one more witness, and then I am going to leave the testimony.

On the 2d day of August, 1909, the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], just before the roll was called on the Payne-Aldrich bill, testified as follows:

And for this Senator I have the fondest personal regard and the profoundest respect. His words are certain, definite, and easily understood.

Schedule G—relating to agricultural products—has been increased about 2 per cent. There should have been reductions in this schedule. They could have been made without the slightest injury to American agriculture. High duties are placed on semitropical fruits, such as lemons and raisins, and on pineapples and rice, and on flour biscuits made by the Cracker Trust, for the benefit of a few individuals in limited sections of the country; and a high duty is placed on corn and wheat to make the great mass of farmers believe that they are being favored. But it is an insult to the intelligence of the American farmer to place a protective duty on corn when we are producing more corn than all the other nations combined. We sell our wheat and corn and the products thereof in the markets of the world, and no duty which might be imposed can affect the price which the farmer receives for them.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BROWN. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator, I believe, is reading from an address I delivered a few years ago?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. Two years ago.

Mr. BRISTOW. I approve of that address now.

Mr. BROWN. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that he approves it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Except that occasionally——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Nebraska can not yield to any other Senator except for the purpose of having a question asked.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the point of order will not be insisted upon. The Senator from Kansas is on the stand by my invitation, and I should like to hear what exception he makes to this statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not making the point of order in behalf of the Senator from Nebraska, but in behalf of the membership of the Senate. I do not believe in interruptions in debate, and I insist upon my point of order that the Senator can only be interrupted by consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order appears to be well taken. The Senator from Kansas has yielded the floor. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I was interrupted in the midst of a sentence. I will read the sentence over.

We sell—

Said the Senator from Kansas—

our wheat and corn and the products thereof in the markets of the world, and no duty which might be imposed can affect the price which the farmer receives for them. We raise far more wheat, corn, cattle, and hogs than we consume, and the result is that the farmer can not be protected by a tariff because the price of his produce is fixed by the world market.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROWN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BORAH. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, and also of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will ask if it is a fact that the duty does not affect farm products, what effect will this measure have upon the cost of living? Will the consumer get any benefit?

Mr. BROWN. The distinguished Senator from Idaho has taken occasion to ask that question of every Senator who has said anything in favor of the bill. I am glad to answer it. I do not think it will have any effect at all. I am not voting for the bill on the theory that I think it will reduce the cost of living. While it has been insisted and asserted on the floor here that the President bases his favor of the law on that proposition, his message to the Congress states distinctly the opposite. It does not rest on that ground.

Mr. BORAH. One more question: Then, I understand, the Senator states that so far as this treaty is concerned it will not affect the consumer at all beneficially?

Mr. BROWN. I think it will affect consumers and producers in this country beneficially to a very great extent.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask, if it does not reduce the cost of farm products and the farm products are the only products put upon the free list, how will it reduce the price to the consumer?

Mr. BROWN. I have not said it will reduce the price to the consumer. I have said it will benefit the consuming and the producing public.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that benefit arises out of the hallucination which we will all enjoy by reason of supposing ourselves to be on more friendly relations with Canada.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Idaho is an expert on hallucinations, and I will not disturb his reverie for a moment.

I have established by testimony, if you can prove anything here by testimony, that a duty on corn and wheat and farm products, whenever we have a surplus, is not a protective duty. If it is not a protective duty it is in violation of the Republican doctrine of protection, which stands for a protective duty when one is necessary and against it when it is not necessary.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BROWN. With pleasure.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will ask the Senator if he does not remember that the position I took in addressing the Senate a few days ago on this bill was that my opposition to it was based largely on the fact that it undertakes to take duties off that are not a burden to the American people and had not materially increased the price of the product, and leaves undisturbed the duties that do increase the price to the American consumer and that had been a shelter for monopoly?

Mr. BROWN. I think that was the statement and testimony of the Senator the other day, when he made his speech. I am not reading this statement of the Senator made two years ago with the purpose of finding fault with him. I am simply undertaking to show, if I can, by good authority, by experts on the question, that the duty on these articles does not affect the price—that it is not protective in character. If that is true, it is an unnecessary duty, and it ought to be taken off. There is no difference in the morality of a duty that is unnecessary and the morality of a duty that is extortionate and excessive. Neither has any merit in it; and whenever it is unnecessary it should be removed, and when it is excessive it should be reduced.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BROWN. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator if I have ever made any statement he has any knowledge of wherein I claimed that these duties might not be beneficial to the farmer in the event that we did not have a surplus of agricultural products?

Mr. BROWN. I have no quarrel with the Senator on that proposition. I have demonstrated here already by the Secretary of Agriculture that we are on an export basis now. This law, as I understand it, is to apply to present conditions. If I recollect correctly, one of the Senators from one of the Dakotas two years ago, in arguing for the duty on wheat, said that in 10 years from now we would have to have a duty on wheat; but at the present time, being on a surplus basis, an export basis, a duty on wheat was not protective. Now, if that was true two years ago it is true to-day. There has been no changed conditions in reference to the wheat industry, except to raise a little more of it every year. Our surplus may not be as large this year as it was last, but the surplus is there. It does not matter whether the surplus is much or little, so long as there is a surplus; it goes out of the country, and the wheat is not going out of the country if it can get a higher price in the country. That seems to me to be so absolutely indisputable that to state the proposition is to prove it. You never would have a bushel of wheat exported if the American price were higher than the foreign price, because the American farmer would not only get a better price at home if it is higher than the foreign price, but he would save the transportation charge across the water in order to get the low price.

It is ridiculous to dispute it. If my good friends whose testimony I have read, than whom there are no better men serving the American people anywhere, were right two years ago, and the Senator from Kansas says he agrees with the same doctrine now, they ought to support this bill now.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BROWN. With pleasure.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if he believes that the President was justified in calling Congress together to remove duties that were not necessary and in no way a burden to the American people?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, it is quite immaterial whether I think the President was justified in calling Congress in extra session or not. That is his business and not mine. I had as much to do about it and I have as much responsibility about it as the Senator from Kansas. Neither of us has any. But I will say to the Senator from Kansas that I think the President is always justified in calling an extra session to take up a great question like this, and doubly justified when the Senate of the United States turned its back on the proposition and refused to vote for it one way or the other at the last regular session. The necessity for the extra session was created by us. If it had not been for our stubbornness, and perhaps for our cowardice, we would have disposed of this matter at the last session and saved this extra session.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire of the Senator if he does not think that since Congress is called in extra session we should remove the duties that are a burden instead of spending so much time in an effort to remove duties that are not a burden?

Mr. BROWN. I am in favor of spending all the time that is necessary in removing the duties that are burdensome and, as well, the duties that are unnecessary. As I said a moment ago, there can be no difference in the morality of a duty if it is unnecessary and if it is excessive, because there is no excuse for the existence of it at all; and we ought to be men enough to say so and to vote so at every opportunity.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the Senator think it is far more important, however, to remove the duties that are actually burdensome to the people than to spend so much time in trying to remove duties that are not a burden and that are of no consequence whatever to either producer or consumer?

Mr. BROWN. I think both are important; and are the strongest reasons why the Senator from Kansas and myself, who believe in lower duties based on the cost of production, ought to welcome this the first great opportunity afforded us to begin the work which will end in fair and reasonable duties where needed.

It occurs to me, Mr. President, that it is not necessary for me to read any additional authority on the subject. These distinguished statesmen were right two years ago when they planted their feet upon the doctrine that the price of agricultural products in this country was not fixed by the duty on the products, and that whatever benefit the agricultural class received from protection was an indirect benefit. In other words, that the duties on manufactured goods which were of direct benefit to the manufacturers and to the laboring men were an indirect benefit to the farmer because the manufacturing classes became purchasers of the products of the farmer. And again I assert that it is a new and a novel doctrine in this country that a duty on any article produced in excess of home demand and which must find a market in Europe has anything to do with the price of the article. The wheat grower of Nebraska is in competition with the wheat grower of Canada and Russia now. The wheat grower of Nebraska is in competition also with the wheat grower of Kansas. There is no less competition with one than with the other. All three—Canada, Kansas, and Nebraska—must meet in the markets of the world and must accept the price fixed at that point. The mere fact that for local reasons—transportation, facilities for handling, demand for manufacturing, warehouse capacity, or other cause—the price of grains differs on the two sides of the Canadian line does not prove that the tariff duty has anything to do with the different prices, because the price of the same commodities in different States at the same time on this side of the line has differed fully as much.

Let it be remembered that in the comparison of prices on wheat, for example, that the prices have often been higher in Winnipeg than on this side of the line. For instance, in 1907 May wheat sold in Winnipeg for 78 cents and in Kansas City for 70 cents. Reciprocity did not scare wheat up in Winnipeg in 1907, although the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] suggests that it scared wheat up in Winnipeg this year.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BROWN. For a question.

Mr. DIXON. Why quote the Kansas City market, 1,500 miles away? Why not quote the corresponding market on that day at Minneapolis, which would correspond to Winnipeg? The Senator's quotation is not fair.

Mr. BROWN. They are all fair. I intend to quote them all. The quotations will show that the prices in Minneapolis, the prices in Chicago, in Kansas City, and in St. Louis on the same day for the same commodity have differed very widely, and demonstrated what? That the duty on wheat in America has absolutely nothing to do with fixing its price, because if the duty on wheat was at work in St. Paul, why should it not be at work on the same day in Kansas City? If the duty on wheat affected the price in Chicago one day, why would it not be effective to cut the price of wheat the same day in Omaha or in Kansas City?

I want to finish reading these quotations.

And the same year December wheat sold in Winnipeg for $1.01 and in Kansas City for 90 cents; and this year May wheat sold in Winnipeg for 93 cents and in Kansas City for 87 cents, and July wheat has sold in Winnipeg for 95 cents and in Kansas City for 84½ cents.

The Nebraska farmer needs just as much protection against the North Dakota and Minnesota wheat grower as he does against the Canadian wheat grower, but he needs no protection against either. The cost of production in Minnesota, Dakota, Nebraska, and Canada is substantially the same, and on this question, aside from the report of the Tariff Commission to the same effect, I desire to read the testimony of another senatorial expert to sustain me in my contention that the wage scale in Canada and America is substantially the same.

On the 24th day of May, 1909, during the tariff debate, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], among other things, said:

> There is another thing to be considered. Along this Canadian border, with nothing but an imaginary line across, it is idle in my judgment, and idle in my experience and observation, to talk about any great difference in wages on one side or the other.

You will observe that this testimony is made up from "experience and observation." Living in one of the border States, evidently the Senator from Minnesota had means of information which must have been accurate.

> When a man by a day's walk can go from a mill on that side to a mill on this side, from a field on that side to a field on this side, that imaginary international boundary line will not maintain any very different scale of wages long upon one side or the other. And they are the same class of men. When we talk about a protective tariff and think of the overcrowded countries of Europe, of the cheap wage scale of Europe—when we realize that the wage earner in Europe must and oftentimes has to borrow and incur a great expense to come to this country—there may be wisdom in attempting to maintain an artificial wall between his country and ours, but when we look to sparsely settled Canada, when we look to a class of men enjoying a wage scale practically the equal of our own wage scale, it seems to me that sooner or later the American people have got to recognize the impossibility of forever maintaining an artificial wall where there is no natural reason for the establishment or maintenance of that wall. Sooner or later, Mr. President, we shall have to recognize on a broader plane this natural relation to Canada. I predict here in the Senate to-day that the time will come when, even with the protective policy as firmly implanted as it is to-day in our general policy, yet in our tariff relation to Canada we will recognize that it must be limited largely upon the basis of revenue as required by that country and this.

I think the Senator from Minnesota is right. He is certainly corroborated by the report of the Tariff Board, which made a somewhat extended investigation into the relative wage scale of Canada and this country. If it be true, Mr. President, as it is, that the cost of production of farm products is substantially the same in the two countries, what can be the justification for a duty?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROWN. For a question.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator any report showing the cost of production in Canada of farm products?

Mr. BROWN. I have the Tariff Board report, which speaks of wages generally, and I have some statistics on the subject that I want to put in in one moment.

Mr. BORAH. That report covers the question of certain wages?

Mr. BROWN. Farm wages.

Mr. BORAH. Is that the only item of production?

Mr. BROWN. No; I have testimony here with reference to the cost of farm products and the cost of work horses, and the cost is much higher in Canada than in this country on all these articles.

Mr. BORAH. From what report does the Senator quote?

Mr. BROWN. I will quote from the report of the Secretary of State when I reach it. If the Senator desires to have it in my speech now, I can put it in now, but I would rather put it in at the place I intended.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to disturb the harmony and the symmetry of the Senator's speech. I am seeking information.

Mr. BROWN. I believe tariff duties ought to be fixed by the measure of production cost. If it costs more to produce in this country, the duty should be high enough to measure the difference; if it costs no more to produce in this country than it does in the foreign country, there should be no duty at all. That is the doctrine I believe in. I contended for it and voted for it in the session of 1909, and I am still for it. Applying that doctrine to Canada, no duty on agricultural products is necessary, and if levied is of no advantage or profit to the farmer in the smallest degree.

Now, when it is admitted that the wage scale in agricultural pursuits is about the same between the two countries, and when it is remembered that the Canadian farmer is compelled to pay more for his horses, more for his feed, and more for his farm implements than the American farmer, and when it is remembered that the Canadian farmer is tilling soil that will produce substantially but one grain—either wheat, or barley, or oats—and that he is unable to diversify his crop, and that he lives in a climate where the frost comes early and stays late, every advantage is in favor of the American farmer. It is undisputed that barley and wheat, the two chief products of Canada, are grains which rob the soil more surely and more quickly than any other crop, and that the lifetime of the soil producing those grains, without artificial recuperation, is less than 10 years. It is no wonder Canadian land is cheap.

But, Mr. President, with these facts in mind I desire to direct the attention of the Senate to the different provisions of the law before us. Its condemnation by Senators has been so general, as a rule, and their words of criticism so denunciatory and indefinite that I think it proper to recite in detail and have in the RECORD in connection with my remarks what the terms of the bill are—the exact and specific terms.

I ask leave to insert without reading a synopsis of the rates in the law, containing the articles affected, the rates of duty now in force by the laws both of Canada and the United States, and the rates proposed in the pending bill, together with the imports and exports to and from each country, and also the customs duties collected by each country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

Mr. BROWN. I want the American people to know in detail the provisions of the act under consideration. It is noticeable, and I think remarkable indeed, that the strongest criticism—that is to say, those made in the loudest tone of voice—against this bill have been generally diligent in keeping away from the details of the law. Generalities have been the safest as well as the longest suit of those who to me seem to have an unreasoning and delirious antipathy to the bill. The provisions of this law can not be accurately and fully understood unless we keep in mind the commercial relationship at present existing between the two countries. Canada has a population of about seven and a half million, while our census shows the population of the United States to be about 12 times as large.

The total annual trade of Canada with all the people of the earth approximates $660,000,000. Of this amount last year her total imports were in round numbers $375,000,000, and of these $225,000,000 came from the United States. The rest of the world sold her the balance, or about $150,000,000 worth of merchandise. Canada has been a constant and a growing consumer and purchaser of American goods. She has purchased largely our manufactured products. It is a remarkable fact that in her efforts to build up and maintain her manufacturing industries by erecting a high tariff wall against the United States and all other countries except Great Britain, she has failed to protect her own manufacturers against the competition of the American manufacturers. As stated by the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] the other day in his somewhat heated and convulsive denunciation of the pending bill, the American manufacturer is now in possession of a very large share of the Canadian market. Our manufacturer is able—and he has demonstrated his ability by performance—to manufacture his goods, pay the freight on them to the Canadian border, pay the duty levied at the Canadian customhouse and undersell the Canadian manufacturer in the Canadian market. This demonstrates two things: First, that our manufacturer needs no protection against the Canadian manufacturer; second, it demonstrates conclusively that to remove the duty on manufactured articles now levied against the Canadian manufacturer when he enters the United States would bring no relief to the American consumer, because the Canadian manufacturer is unable to compete with the American manufacturer in his own market, and he is therefore unable to compete in the American market with the American manufacturer. That was the reason, it seemed to me, the amendments of the distinguished Senator from Iowa reducing the duties as against Canada on the manufactured articles, aside from the one affecting lumber, offered no compensation at all, except compensation on paper, to the American farmer or the American consumer.

I was glad to vote for his amendment taking the duty off of lumber in all its forms, because Canada is already paying the American duty on lumber and is in competition with the American manufacturer in the American market, and I am in favor of free lumber with Canada and with the world for two reasons: First, no duty is necessary; and, second, I believe that the free entry of lumber tends to conserve the timber supply of our own country.

In this connection permit me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the head and front of the opposition to the pending measure is and has been the Lumber Trust of this country, aided and assisted by the International Paper Co., commonly known as the Paper Trust, which is in fact the most selfish and impudent trust of the age. To sustain this suggestion permit me to call your attention to a recent speech of Mr. Edward Hines—the Senate has some acquaintance with Mr. Hines—in which he said some most significant and remarkable things. When I find this man Hines, for years at the head of the lumber lobby and the lumber combination of the country, appearing before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, speaking by and with the authority of the lumber interests, interviewing Senators, and incidentally, according to testimony that is very slightly disputed, electing a Senator now and then to the United States Senate, when I find him leading the assault—a personal assault—against the President of the United States, and opposing this law in the name of and for the sake of the farmers of this country, I begin to think that there must be something in this bill which ought to command the respect and support of every honest man in this country.

Here is the speech made in Chicago to the National Lumber Dealers. I find it published in the Chicago Daily News under date of Wednesday, May 24, 1911. Here are the headlines in the first column on the front page:

HINES IS EXONERATED BY LUMBER DEALERS—MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL BODY HERE CHEER LORIMER AID AND PASS RESOLUTIONS.

The first column is given to a recital of the fact that more than 300 members of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association were in that city holding a convention and extending the right hand of fellowship to Edward Hines, their president and the head of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. I find this report on page 3 of the edition:

The President (Edward Hines) then proceeded with his address. The matter of Canadian reciprocity was gone into at considerable length, the speaker declaring that if the bill becomes a law that not one of the northern border States will support President Taft should he be renominated for the Presidency.

But what I have quoted are the words of the reporter. Let me quote the words of Mr. Hines himself. Among other things he said:

We protest against the duty on lumber, which is justified under either tariff policy, and is in the interest of the public because it is in the interest of forest conservation, being made the football in the struggle for mere political advantage.

Now, that bill is in the Senate under discussion in the Finance Committee. The lumber industry has made an extremely favorable impression on that committee.

Mr. Hines certainly knew what he was talking about; he certainly had inside information when he informed the public that the lumber industry had made an extremely favorable impression on that committee, because the bill putting the lumber industry practically on the free list was returned by that committee without its approval.

But Mr. Hines continued:

And it is believed that not to exceed 3 of its membership of 15 are really in favor of the bill, and that a similar situation prevails in the Senate as a whole.

Now, mark what Mr. Hines said about what would happen. Mr. Hines seems to have had inside information on what the committee would do, for he informs his audience a week before the bill comes out of the Senate committee just what would happen. This is his language:

The bill will be reported out of the committee, but probably with material amendments designed to introduce into it some genuine reciprocity. Possibly it may be reported out simply without recommendation; but this is certain, that if no member of the committee felt himself bound by party ties or obligations or was under no pledge to the administration the bill as it stands would be adversely reported by a vote of about 11 to 4.

When did Edward Hines, the head of the Lumber Trust and the manipulator of legislatures, according to his own statement, in two different States, have access to or make a poll of our Committee on Finance, so that he could speak with authority to his associates when addressing them and tell them just what the vote would be? It is most significant and most remarkable.

Mr. Hines continued as follows:

When it was seen that its reciprocity was confined largely to the title and that in its provisions it was nonreciprocal and in many respects inequitable—

These are Hines's words. How often have we heard this language on the floor of the Senate in this debate in opposition to the pending measure.

Hines continues, and I repeat:

And that in its provisions it was nonreciprocal and in many respects inequitable. Public opinion rapidly changed, until now it is freely predicted that if the bill becomes a law not one of the border States from ocean to ocean, in which the farmers control, will give its support to the sponsor of the bill in the next national election if he should be renominated for the presidency. This is the report that comes especially from the farming interests, who have been thoroughly aroused to the discrimination shown against that great industry.

When we take into consideration this speech of Mr. Hines, in connection with the letter that he addressed to members of the Lumber Dealers' Association, calling on them to help defeat the reciprocity agreement, in which he said—the agreement which, chiefly because of our efforts, failed to become a law at the last session of Congress—

it is clear that the head and front, the force and venom of the opposition to this bill is to be found in the Lumber Trust, aided and abetted by the Paper Trust, and every other lawless combination in the United States.

In line with this remarkable and significant utterance, coming as it does from Hines, a man of known occupation and known tendencies, permit me to call your attention to the fact that in the hearings had before our Finance Committee, now contained in a printed volume of something like 1,400 pages, more than 350 pages are taken up by the Lumber Dealers' Association and the Paper Trust combination in their efforts to show to the committee that for the sake of the dear farmer of the land this law should be defeated.

Let me read you from the testimony of Mr. Bronson, the successor of Edward Hines, now president of the National Lumber Dealers' Association. On page 799 this witness says:

But we have shown to you, I think, that our prices are very low; that this treaty discriminates against the lumber industry, among a few others, and that there is absolutely no reciprocity in it, so far as the lumber industry is concerned—we give all and get nothing. We ask that certain amendments be made; that if we are to give Canada the benefit of free access to the rough-lumber market of our country that Canada in return shall give us access to her forests, which she does not do; that if rough lumber is to be admitted free into each country that dressed lumber shall be admitted on equal terms into each country.

Senators will recall that as the treaty leaves the lumber duties, Canada will have the American manufactured lumber entering her ports at a duty of 25 per cent, and under the pending bill there this duty is reduced to 7 per cent on Canadian manufactured lumber coming into American ports. This man Bronson, the successor of Hines, suggests that they ought to have equal terms.

His testimony continues:

We object to the whole bill as being nonreciprocal and inequitable, not only to us but to others.

The others referred to Bronson specifically names later on in his testimony, when he says:

And it has already had a serious effect on farm-land values, and it is lessening the borrowing power of the farmer and consequently his buying power, threatening him by what he sees ahead of him, not only in one line but in all lines. It has affected bank loans, and it threatens for an indefinite period to destroy the very basis of any possible activity.

How good it is to know that the Lumber Trust of the country is, like a watchman on the tower, guarding the interests of the farmer!

Another witness before the committee, Mr. Griggs, of the State of Washington, a lumber dealer, testified on page 812 of the hearings as follows:

We say, "Protect the farmer; save him!" If there is any argument we can put up, we want you to save him.

How safe the farmer ought to feel when he knows that these men who have been combining to rob him for 20 years have now taken up the fight to save him and to protect him.

I could read from the testimony of many other witnesses, those in the lumber business and those in the business of manufacturing paper, who supplemented the arguments in their own favor with the final appeal to the committee that above everything else Congress ought to defeat the bill, not so much to save the Lumber and Paper Trusts as to save the poor and distressed farmer.

Mr. President, permit me to say that no man in this body has or could have any prejudice against the American farmer. My constituents are farmers. I know them. They are good men; they are good citizens; they earn far more than they receive for their labor. They deserve and shall have fair treatment from their Government which they have so constantly and loyally supported.

I could have no possible motive and could get no possible satisfaction in seeing a law passed which might in any possible event work to their injury. Nebraska is not a manufacturing State; Nebraska has no timber lands, no oil lands, no coal beds, no iron or zinc ore. Her chief industry is agriculture; and if I had the remotest fear that this law would injure her people, who are my neighbors, in the slightest degree, I should feel it my duty to resolve the fear or the doubt in their favor. But, Mr. President, the farmers of Nebraska want a square deal; that is all. They believe, as I do, that protection as a system has been of great advantage to them, because it has directly built up manufacturing industries which have employed thousands and millions and furnished a multitude of wage earners, who have been good consumers and have had purchasing power and have become customers for the products which the farmer has raised.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. In just a moment.

They believe in that protection which gives to the manufacturer whatever duty is necessary for him to keep his factory open and to keep his labor employed, and to keep it employed at a fair wage and not at the level of wages in some of the foreign countries. The Nebraska farmer is in favor of that sort of a duty. He believes and he knows that many of the duties on manufactured articles to-day under the existing law are unnecessary, excessive, and extortionate. He is in the struggle determined to do what he can to lower those duties to a square level, and the Nebraska farmer welcomes this opportunity to demonstrate his good faith in his fight for lower duties where they are excessive and for the removal of duties where they are unnecessary by consenting to have the duties taken off of the products he raises so long as he knows those duties are not protective in character and are not necessary to maintain his present prices.

The time will come when the American farmer in other States as well as in Nebraska will find that these criticisms leveled against this bill in his name are all criticisms which are born of necessity in an effort either to stop tariff revision downward or to discredit and humiliate the President of the United States. The Nebraska farmer believes that the only way, the only plan, which is feasible and logical and which will result in a substantial and decent tariff revision downward is to have duties fixed by Congress, proceeding a subject or a schedule or a country at a time. He knows, as all men will know within 18 months after this reciprocity law is passed and approved, his fight for equitable tariff duties has been won.

But to return to the bill under consideration, the total value of the imports from Canada of the articles contained in the free list of the pending bill for the year ending June 30, 1910, was, in round numbers, $40,000,000.

Of these, agricultural products aggregated, in round numbers, $8,000,000. Of these, the timber and lumber of all kinds imported that year but which are in this bill put on the free list aggregated the value, in round numbers, of $19,000,000, on which Americans paid a total tariff duty, in round numbers, of $1,500,000. The provision of the law which remits these lumber duties, together with that provision contained in the bill which remits the duties paid on wood products for paper purposes, aggregating in all almost one and three-quarters millions of dollars, commends itself to me as a most valuable concession to the people of this country.

Here we find the motive which actuates Mr. Hines. This law takes away lumber tariffs collected last year of a million and a half dollars the people had to pay. Is it any wonder that Hines rebels when the opportunity is taken away from him to collect it?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BROWN. In just a moment, if the Senator will permit me to finish this paragraph.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is stating as a fact something which, in my judgment, is not a fact.

Mr. BROWN. I am willing to have the Senator's fact go into the RECORD, but I should like to pursue this paragraph to its end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. BROWN. When I speak of the people of this country I speak of all the people of this country. Farmers are interested no more and no less than other people in having these duties on lumber and wood products removed. All classes are consumers of these products, and all classes will share alike in the benefits of the provision. When you weigh the benefits of free lumber and free pulp against the losses of the duty on corn and the duty on wheat and the duty on any other agricultural product, which are of no actual benefit to the producer of these products, the balance is all in favor of our country and our people.

Now, I will yield to the Senator if he desires to make a correction of my figures.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator states that this duty, amounting to a million and a half, had been paid by the consumers, the people of this country. Has the price of lumber been reduced any?

Mr. BROWN. I do not think so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is very easily demonstrated, and it is conceded by those who have investigated this matter on both sides of the question, that this million and a half dollars has gone into the hands of the Canadian lumber dealers.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the Senator is against the removal of the duty on lumber; I am in favor of it; and so we can not agree on what is the best provision in regard to it. I have emphasized the fact that no industry is entitled to a duty unless it is necessary, and I think the duty on lumber is unnecessary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. And I think that an unnecessary duty is morally wrong, and that it ought to be taken off.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further?

Mr. BROWN. I yield for a question.

Mr. BORAH. The duty on lumber may be unnecessary, but the question which I asked was, Has the price of lumber been reduced to the consumer by reason of the reduction of the duty on lumber?

Mr. BROWN. I do not think so. I do not think it has been reduced. I think the price is kept up by Mr. Hines and his associates without regard to the duty. I think they have a combination, a part of which is now under indictment——

Mr. STONE. There ought not to be any duty at all on lumber.

Mr. BROWN. And which absolutely fixes the price, duty or no duty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The point I desired to make was, that the reduction of the duty did not benefit the purchaser of lumber, but it did lose to the Treasury of the United States a million and a quarter dollars of revenue, which we might just as well have had, because, according to the argument of the Senator, that million and a quarter dollars has gone into the pockets of Mr. Hines and his friends. The American consumer did not get it. My opinion is it went into the pockets of the Canadian lumber dealer.

Mr. BROWN. The generally accepted doctrine is that the combination which controls our market, regardless of the tariff, has an opportunity, and always improves the opportunity, to absorb whatever protection is levied at the customhouse.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If we reduced the duty so as to deprive the Treasury of a million and a quarter dollars of revenue, if the consumer did not get it, and if the lumber combines and trusts did get it, who was benefited by the reduction of the duty?

Mr. BROWN. Is the Senator in favor of a duty as a revenue duty or as a protective duty?

Mr. BORAH. I maintain that the duty on lumber is a revenue duty, and it was a revenue duty when it was $2.

Mr. BROWN. You are for a tariff-for-revenue-only on lumber—is that it?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not for that. I am for a protective duty, even upon lumber; but the fact is that that duty was not protective. The fact is that the duty was already reduced to a revenue basis. We reduced it more and lost a million and a quarter dollars, and thereby deprived the Government of a million and a quarter dollars of revenue, and that million and a quarter dollars went into the hands of those who control the lumber interests, and, in my opinion, on the other side of the line.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is in discord with the lumber people who testified that the present duty on lumber is a protective duty; and in the hearings before the Finance Committee they demanded that the duty be kept upon lumber for protective purposes. I refer the Senator to page 847 of the hearings.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not seeking to be either in accord or discord. I am speaking as to the fact, as shown by the figures and by the record. I am taking the Senator's own argument—that is, that we reduced the duty on lumber; that we thereby deprived ourselves of a million and a quarter dollars' revenue; that the consumer did not get it; and that the combines of which he speaks took it up. I leave the record as he has made it.

Mr. BROWN. I understand the position of the Senator is that the duty on lumber must be saved. I suppose that the men who testified before the committee, who were in the lumber business, knew as much about their own business as any of us; and they testified that it was a protective duty. That was the reason they were advocating its retention.

But, Mr. President, there are other advantages in the bill which are directly and emphatically in the interests of the agricultural classes. Clover and timothy seed, which has heretofore cost the farmers a duty of 10 per cent in order to get it into the Canadian market, under this law are permitted to enter that market free. We sold last year to Canada about $700,000 worth of these seeds and had to pay a 10 per cent duty in order to get into the market. Under this law fresh vegetables, including potatoes, are admitted into the Canadian market free.

Last year we exported to Canada more than 215,000 bushels of potatoes, but before we could get into the Canadian market with our potatoes we paid the Canadian Government a duty of 20 cents on every bushel. Under this law potatoes will have free entrance into the Canadian market. More than 37,000 bushels American sweet potatoes were sold to Canadians last year, upon which the Canadian Government charged the American farmer 10 cents on every bushel. Under reciprocity this product will have free entry into the Canadian market. Take apples, for example. We sold to Canada last year 59,000 barrels, and on each barrel paid the Canadian duty of 40 cents. Under the proposed law the American apple has free entry into the Canadian market. And so with other fruits, such as peaches and berries. We shipped last year into Canada millions of pounds and thousands of barrels of fruit, but on every shipment we paid a high Canadian duty, in order to enter the market at all. Last year we sold to Canada 750,000 dozen eggs, but on every dozen the Canadian Government collected from the American farmer 3 cents. This duty the proposed law removes. Then there is cottonseed oil, which under the Payne-Aldrich Act comes into this country free, but when it seeks a market in Canada we pay a 17½ per cent duty. Last year we sold to Canada more than 2,000,000 gallons of this American commodity, a commodity in which the southern farmer has a very large interest. But we were compelled to pay a high duty in order to sell it to the Canadian consumer.

I might go on through the list and name the articles one after another wherein it is provided that the tariff wall heretofore raised and now in existence by Canada against the entry of the products of the farmer is by this law taken down, but I will not take the time.

Can anyone doubt that the farmer of Iowa and Illinois and Wisconsin and Minnesota and the Dakotas and Kansas and Nebraska, indeed the farmers of all the country, who live in a climate which permits them to diversify their crops from year to year, and thereby sustain and conserve the soil of their land from year to year, doing business in a climate where a small per cent of their profits is expended in shelter against the snows and the frosts and the ices of long winter, with these concessions which I have named all in his favor, and with his opportunity to raise the corn with which to fatten his live stock—can anyone seriously doubt he will be able to compete with the Canadian farmer, whose only concession in this bill is a free American market for the limited kinds of grain which he can produce? When you tell the Nebraska farmer, who enjoys the advantages of climate, of a diversity of crops, of the power to raise corn to fatten his hogs and his steers and his sheep, where the winters are short and mild compared to the winters of Canada, that he can not compete with the Canadian farmer, who is unable to raise corn, and therefore can not fatten his own hogs or his own cattle or his sheep, and who has from five to six months winter every year, he is likely to laugh at your contention. The truth is that the American farmer, like the American manufacturer, in a free field can overproduce and undersell and overcome his neighbor across the line.

Mr. President, this bill is the corner stone of a new tariff system which will contain honest protective duties, and which will put an end forever, I hope, to unnecessary and excessive duties. I believe in fair and just protective duties. So believing, I welcome this, the first opportunity, to begin the destruction of unfair and unjust duties. If we refuse to take the first step, everybody knows the second step never will be taken. By removing duties now from the agricultural schedule against our country which are unnecessary and unprotective in point of fact and principle, no power on earth can stay the march against excessive duties on manufactured articles against the world. Tremendous effort has been made to mislead and deceive the American farmer by making him think he would be compensated if manufactured articles from Canada by this bill were admitted free into this country, and that because the bill fails to remove the duty on those articles from Canada he will be compelled to buy in a protected market while he is compelled to sell in a free market. The argument is unsound and specious, if not deliberately a pretense. For everybody knows the farmer now sells his produce in a free market with all the grain-producing countries of the world, and, so far as that feature of the bill is concerned, his status is the same under the present law as it will be under this law.

Not only that. Everybody knows that to remove the duty against Canada on manufactured articles would not bring a single Canadian manufactured article into this country for the farmer to buy, because already Canada is unable to supply her own people with manufactured articles, and the American manufacturer is in possession of the Canadian market. After paying the freight, after paying the duty which Canada lays on American manufactured goods, the American manufacturer has taken a large share of the Canadian market away from the Canadian manufacturer in his own home and in his own country. The American farmer will get no relief from excessive duties on the things he buys until we remove or lower the duty on articles coming from other countries than Canada and which are able to compete with our manufacturers. What we want is lower duties, protective and necessary—not unnecessary and extortionate—on manufactured goods, and to get them from the world. I favor the bill which leads the way eventually and inevitably to that result.

Mr. President, I have numerous tables and statistics here, which I ask permission to insert in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to follows.

TABLE A.—Articles included under the reciprocal trade agreement imported into the Dominion of Canada from the United States during the fiscal year ended Mar. 31, 1910.

[Compiled by the Bureau of Trade Relations, Department of State, from "Trade and Navigation, 1910," issued by the Canadian Department of Customs.]

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator resumes his seat I should like to ask him a question rather general in its nature. After this bill becomes a law, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska to tell me what reason there will be for the farmers of the State of Nebraska to vote the Republican ticket and vote for the Republican policy of protection?

Mr. BROWN. The same reason that has always existed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the reason the farmer has heretofore voted for protection was on the assumption that he was getting a benefit more or less direct, or upon the assumption that he was building up a home market for his products, not a home market for the products of some competing country, but for his own. Under this bill, after it becomes a law, the farmer is not building up a home market for himself, but he is also building up a market by paying the increased prices that follow protection for the things that he buys and allowing those who compete with him equal benefits in that market without compelling them to pay equally for the benefits of that market.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. BROWN. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not got the answer that I would like to get from the Senator from Nebraska. I want to know now why a farmer should be a protectionist?

Mr. BROWN. The farmer has the same reason for being a protectionist to-day that he has always had, and he will have the same reason for being a protectionist after this bill is passed that he has always had.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that that answers the question, because, if the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me by the Senator's own argument the farmer has not now and he never has had any reason for being a protectionist.

Mr. BROWN. He has had every reason to be a protectionist.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator tell me what the reason is?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. And he is in favor to-day of protection and of duties that are protective.

Mr. STONE. I was simply going to say that the farmer never had any reason for being a protectionist. That is the correct answer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the argument of the Senator from Missouri is equally as good as the argument of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from North Dakota did not hear my argument with reference to the farmer, but he comes in at this stage and asks me to go over it again, and I can not do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. The American farmer stands, I think, just where every candid man ought to stand—I will not say that; but from my viewpoint where every reasonable man believing in protection has the right to stand, and that is upon the doctrine that a duty should be levied whenever a duty is necessary to equalize the difference between an industry at home and in other countries. If there is substantially no difference, any duty that is imposed is unnecessary, and therefore wrong. The farmers of this country who are protectionists are protectionists because they believe in that principle of equalizing conditions of production, and they are willing to have that doctrine applied to their industry just as they insist on applying it to the industries of others.

From the State Department report I submit the following table, showing cost of farm implements in Canada and the United States:

Mr. KENYON and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. KENYON. I simply want to hold the floor. I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], I wish to answer the last proposition of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN].

It would be impossible for anyone acquainted with the conditions along the border line of Canada and the United States to assert that the cost of production is the same in each section. It is possible that the cost of producing dairy products may be very similar in one country and the other as to the older and eastern sections, but the Senator must take into consideration in estimating his cost of production the value of the lands and the improvements. If it requires, under the present conditions, as it does require, practically twice as much capital to be invested in lands in Minnesota or North Dakota as compared with capital invested in Canadian lands—and I am speaking now of wheat lands—on which to raise their crops, and if it is demonstrated, as it has been in all of the evidence given before us, that in the Saskatchewan, in the Manitoba, and in the Alberta country just as valuable crops are raised, and, in fact, under present conditions, crops of considerably more value are raised on the Canadian side, the Senator can easily see that the cost of production on this side must be materially greater than it is on the other side, even though wages should be just as high or even higher on the other side, and even though farm machinery might be just as high or even higher.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, as a matter of fact farm machinery is very much higher across the line.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is somewhat higher.

Mr. BROWN. Very much higher.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the cost of farm machinery, in estimating profits of the farming industry, is so small, at least the difference between the American and Canadian price is so small in considering it as capital invested, that it could hardly be taken into consideration. I presume that freight charges in the northwestern Provinces are considerably more than in Minnesota and North Dakota, nearer the place where the machines are manufactured, and therefore the price must necessarily be higher in those northwestern Provinces; but suppose the reaper, which is estimated to last 10 years, costs $15 or $20 more, that would mean $10 or $15 more spread over a period of 10 years as an investment, and that would be so small that the Senator would scarcely take it into consideration as a basis in the computation of profits. But when you buy a half section of land in my State at $45 and $50 an acre, whereas the Canadian farmer can buy a half section in Saskatchewan at $20 and $25 an acre, and he produces in value just as much off of the Saskatchewan land as you do off of the North Dakota land, then production in Saskatchewan costs very much less than it does in my State. So you are not equalizing conditions, because the cost of labor is practically the same and the cost of the machinery is practically the same. The evidence showed—and there was a great deal of it taken before the Committee on Finance—and I think both sides, Democrats and Republicans, agreed that, considering the capital employed, it does cost considerably more in this country to raise wheat, barley, oats, and flax than it does in Canada; and to that extent we are asking protection.

Mr. President, I can not see how a farmer in my State can be asked to support the Republican policy of protection if he is to have no protection whatever. We have clearly demonstrated the fact that we are receiving a protection of from 10 to 15 cents a bushel upon our wheat in that section—I am not saying they are receiving it down in Kansas or in Nebraska, but we are——

Mr. BROWN. Let me ask the Senator there——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment; let me finish the sentence—and we are receiving a protection of from 20 to 25 cents a bushel on barley, and this year, though not every year, about 30 cents a bushel on flax. Having demonstrated that we have received that benefit, we are going to lose that benefit the moment wheat or any of these grains can pass free over the line.

I have argued with the people in the State of North Dakota, in Minnesota, in Montana, and wherever I have spoken upon the subject, that it was their duty to support the Republican policy of protection—first, because they were receiving a direct benefit, and, secondly, because by building up the home industries they were creating a market which would give them a special benefit—and they would get in all cases a direct benefit the moment that our consumption and our production equalized or nearly equalized each other. If I now say to those farmers, "Still stand by the Republican doctrine of protection for the purpose of building up your home industries, for the purpose of building up your home markets, so that you may increase the demand at home," will not the intelligent farmer of my State reply to me, "I am not building up that home market for myself; I am building up that home market at my exclusive expense for the benefit of those who are equally near that market and who can have the advantage of that market without having to pay for it; that being the case, then it seems to me that I should go to the Democratic idea of a tariff for revenue only and let it be levied fairly"? That seems to me the logical position in which we are placed, and I would scarcely be in a position to ask the Republicans of my State to vote for the protective policy right along and they at the same time to receive no protection upon their products. I would rather be forced to tell them, if they get no protection, if they are not building up a market for themselves, but for foreigners, that then they should vote for a policy which will bring in everything that they purchase just as reasonably and as cheaply as it is possible for them to get it.

That seems to be the logical position that the farmers of the Northwest must occupy if this bill goes through, unless we, as Republicans, can still hold out to them the hope that when the Republicans themselves get back to the good old commonsense idea of a universal protection, and not a protection of manufacturers at the expense of the farming public, they may then get their honest protection and grant honest protection in return for it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have no desire to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing at length this already much-discussed bill, but this is rather a quiet and meditative hour when the usual enthusiasm over the discussion seems to have somewhat abated, and I am desirous of submitting a few brief observations. To a beginner at least the debates in this Senate are of great interest.

On legislative questions I believe we should, as suggested by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] a few days ago, approach debate with an open mind, free from prejudice, with no preconceived notions if possible, and with a desire only to seek the truth and the right. Otherwise, what is the use of debate; why waste all this time? I have tried to approach in this way this very important question.

I have attended the hearings of the Finance Committee religiously and listened to nearly all of this extended debate, although not at all times so religiously, trying to get all the light possible. Sometimes the light has seemed to shine rather dimly. I am not convinced that the proposed reciprocity agreement will work injury to the agricultural interests of the country; but inasmuch as there is a doubt in my mind on that question, I have deemed it my duty, as a representative of a great agricultural State whose prosperity is entirely dependent on agriculture, to cast my vote against the bill.

The Republican Party is committed to the doctrine of a protective tariff—a tariff which shall equal the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad and no more. It is not committed as a party, in my judgment, to the high duties as set forth in the woolen schedule, the cotton schedule, or the steel schedule of the Payne-Aldrich bill.

My great predecessor, Jonathan P. Dolliver, in my humble judgment one of the most brilliant statesmen who ever sat in this body, gave the best energy of his life, and, in my opinion, practically life itself, in the great fight he made for cheaper clothing for the American people in his attack on the high woolen duties of the Payne-Aldrich bill, and went to his death fighting a battle for the people as much as any soldier on the battle field ever did. As to this schedule, it has been conceded in our party from the President down that the rates on woolen goods were too high; that the woolen schedule was indefensible. Why, then, should they not be lowered, and why not now? Why should further tribute be exacted from the laborer and the farmer and all the American people by these excessive duties on the clothes they must have? Ordinarily it would be wise to wait a reasonable time for information from the Tariff Board as to the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. It would seem, however, that the Republican majority in the Senate has light enough on this subject to formulate a bill reducing the tariff on woolen goods in conformity with the Republican doctrine. Why is this not fully as important as the reciprocity bill?

The farmer has stood by the Republican Party and its tariff policy loyally and with steadfastness, in storm and in sunshine. The returns from the farm precincts after supper on election night have always been consoling to the Republican Party and enabled the Republican candidate to enjoy a restful night. The farmer is willing that the tariff be revised along the lines of Republican policy, farm products as well as manufactured products, but he is not agreeable to the proposition that the doctrine of protection shall not be of equal application; that it shall apply only to the manufacturer. He believes that if it is to exist for the manufacturer, it should also exist for the farmer. If the tariff is to be taken off of what he sells, he believes it should also be taken off of what he buys. He believes in an equitable application of this doctrine or no application at all.

The farmer is entitled to exactly the same consideration as the manufacturer, and the manufacturer the same as the farmer. Neither has any particular right to tariff duties. They are given as a part of a supposedly wise policy to develop our industries and preserve our market for our own people.

We now have a Tariff Board investigating the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. I trust we may soon have a permanent tariff commission, eliminating the question entirely from politics. It is a business, a commercial question, and should have no place in politics. What strange bedfellows it makes in politics! It partakes somewhat of the amusing to see the free-trade Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the high-tariff Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] blowing out the gas and crawling under the same political counterpane.

The complaint of the day is the high cost of living. It has been argued by some that the purpose of the present bill was to reduce the high cost of living. The President, as I understand it, has not claimed that it will reduce the cost of living, but that, in his judgment, it will prevent further increase, at least for a while.

We are living in an extravagant age. We are money mad and racing through life at a neck-breaking pace, piling up fortune on fortune; men worth millions striving for more, never stopping to think that there is no pocket in the shroud. The rich are flaunting their riches in the faces of the poor. We see some of our citizens at the coronation of a King endeavor to outdo the aristocracy of Europe, even to the wearing of knee breeches, if necessary to properly ape royalty.

We see a hundred and twenty thousand dollar organ at the opening of a millionaire's home in New York and a long line of hungry men at midnight in the same city, constituting the bread line. Girls working in stores for $5 a week, and the proprietor of such stores dying and leaving millions to museums. Is it any wonder that the people of the country are restless? The problem of the control of great wealth is the most important problem of the hour and the one that should receive our attention. Would that we might get away from the racking, never-ceasing, wearying commercialism of the day and think less of acquiring wealth.

But the farmer is not attending coronations or paying for hundred-thousand-dollar organs. He is not spending the summer in yachting and is not starting on tours to Europe. It is true he takes the family and goes to the circus once in a while, but he does not indulge in vulgar displays of wealth. The farmer is not growing rich outside of the increase in the value of his land. He is not responsible for the high cost of living. He is not giving away libraries or museums or endowing colleges with millions. He is working from early morn till late at night in the sun and in the rain. His is a life of hardship, trial, and toil, but nevertheless full of the good things of life, and his toil and labor and hardship make for the best citizenship. Free rural-mail delivery and the telephone have eased somewhat the life of the farmer and the farmer's wife. Men from manufacturing States are legislating concerning him, many of whom do not know whether a hydraulic ram is used to pump water or whether its activities are directed toward propagating a better grade of sheep.

But the farmer is not a complaining man. Though the heat may burn up his crops at times, though floods may come and devastate his fields, he goes on contentedly, persevering, improving his home, educating his children, making the world better. He is the backbone of the Nation and saves it in every crisis. The senior Senator from Massachusetts has paid a glowing tribute to the farmer in his fascinating book of the story of the Revolution, in which he speaks of the farmer at the bridge at Concord and the shot that echoed far, and also the farmer at Bennington. It is true that the farmer has always saved the Nation in its hour of peril. It was true in the Revolutionary War, and it was true in the Civil War, and will always be true in every crisis in our national life.

Trusts and combinations are responsible for the high cost of living; not the farmer. Let us grapple with them if we want reduction in the cost of living. The farmer has stood for a protective tariff all these years; has believed in planting the factory beside the farm, and thought in doing this he was helping to build up a great home market and benefiting the entire Nation; and all he asks now, and all he ever will ask, is that the protective tariff laws be of equal operation. He is not asking for governmental favors—merely equal treatment. This, he insists, is justice, and this he will have. When trusts and combinations are controlled, when the law of competition shall again be enthroned, the cost of living will be reduced, and not till then. I am one of those who do not believe we should be in a hurry to adjourn. I do not understand the cry that business is disturbed by Congress remaining in session. It must be peculiar business that is disturbed by the exercise of governmental constitutional rights. Many important matters demand attention. I believe that Congress should remain in session and grapple with the trust problem. I have been strongly in hopes that we might enact some adequate pension laws for the relief of the men who freely offered their lives for their country, and I would gladly stay here until December to secure pension legislation.

We must get back to more simple living in this country. We have forgotten how to practice economy; have forgotten it in the Government. I have thought that the Senate might well commence to teach to the country a lesson in economy by abolishing a lot of useless commissions. We are surrounded on every hand by commissions; commissions to the right of us; commissions to the left of us. Canadian Boundary Commission, Mexican Boundary Commission, Monetary Commission, filled for the most part by those who have been repudiated by their constituencies.

Mr. President, I am honored by representing, in part, a great agricultural State, in many respects the greatest State in the Union. In 1910 it stood third in the value of crops raised, exceeded only by the empire of Texas and the great Commonwealth of Illinois. Mr. Blaine, when he was Secretary of State, upon being asked by some friends from England, who were making a tour of the United States, what was the most essential thing for them to see, promptly responded that no matter what else they missed that they must not neglect to ride across Iowa in the day time, and, if possible, in the harvest season.

The production of Iowa farm crops at the farm last year was, according to the estimate of the Agricultural Department, in round numbers, $328,677,500. The value of domestic animals on the farms the same year was $392,589,190, making a total value of farm crops and domestic animals on the farms of Iowa last year of $721,266,690.

A corn crop of 343,870,000 bushels, worth at the farm $123,792,000, ranking second in production of corn, or 11 per cent of all corn raised in the United States.

Milch cows, valued at $56,520,000, ranking second in the number and value of milch cows, 7.2 per cent of all cows in the United States.

Cattle other than milch cows, value $180,164,000, ranking second in the value of cattle, exceeded only by Texas.

Hogs, $73,280,000, ranking first in hog production, producing 16.8 per cent of all hogs produced in the United States.

Hay, $36,188,000, ranking fourth among the States.

Horses, $173,640,000, ranking second in value among the States.

Oats, value $48,889,000, ranking first among the States and raising 16½ per cent of all oats raised in the United States.

Potatoes, $7,344,000, ranking eighth among States in this.

Poultry, $12,270,000, near if not in first place.

The value of the gold production in the United States, including Alaska, in 1909 was $99,232,000, almost equaled by the value of the hogs raised in Iowa in a single year.

The value of pig-iron production in 1909 was $254,000,000, about the value of corn and hogs in Iowa.

Copper production, $124,000,000, about equal to the corn crop of Iowa.

Lumber production of the United States, $510,576,000, two hundred million less than the combined value of Iowa crops and domestic animals.

Our agricultural college is the greatest in the world, and the Iowa State fair has no peer.

It is not only in agricultural products that our State is great, but also in the quality of her citizenship. "In all that is good, Iowa affords the best." "Iowa, the affections of her people, like the rivers of her borders, flow on to an inseparable union." We have assisted in populating California, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Kansas, Oklahoma, and other Western States, and Louisiana, Mississippi, and other Southern States are indebted to us for large numbers of their best citizens.

No industry within the borders of Iowa can prosper if the farmer does not.

I have been charged with giving ear to the voice of my State on this question. To this I plead guilty and offer no apology. I will cease to be a true representative of my State when I cease to consult the wishes of my people on legislative matters. I have made an earnest effort to ascertain on this question the real interests of my State and to keep in touch with the best sentiment of the highest grade citizenship of which any State can boast—a citizenship which shares with Nebraska the honor of having the least per cent of illiteracy of any State in the Union.

This question is merely one of barter and trade—a commercial agreement. It does not involve any great moral issue. Therefore, if there is a doubt as to its effect upon the agricultural interests of my State, it is my duty, as I see it, to resolve that doubt in favor of those interests and vote against the pact, and I shall do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. THORNTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana raises the question of the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	McCumber	Shively
Bourne	Curtis	McLean	Smoot
Bradley	Davis	Martin, Va.	Stone
Brandegee	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Sutherland
Briggs	Foster	Myers	Swanson
Bristow	Gore	Nelson	Taylor
Bryan	Gronna	Newlands	Thornton
Burnham	Guggenheim	Oliver	Townsend
Burton	Heyburn	Overman	Warren
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Page	Wetmore
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Williams
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Penrose	Works
Crawford	Lippitt	Perkins
Culberson	Lodge	Pomerene

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment while I ask for the publication of a document?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. On the 14th instant the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] submitted an amendment to the bill relating to paragraph 347 of Schedule J. He left with me some tables which he desires shall be printed. The tables show a comparison of the duties under his amendment with the present law. I ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to have the tables printed as a document, or in the RECORD?

Mr. BRISTOW. To be printed as a document for the use of the Senate pending the discussion of the amendment which the Senator from Iowa offered. (S. Doc. No. 68.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the order to print will be entered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it is not a question of yielding, but I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Missouri taking the floor at this time. I had the floor when the question of a quorum was raised, but I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I am obliged for the courtesy of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, it has been asked why a Democrat should support this reciprocity bill. It is said that the agreement made between the chief executive officials of the United States and Canada is a measure proposed by the President, and that it is therefore a Republican administration measure, and because of that the question is asked, Why should a Democrat support it?

In answering that I begin by saying that that view is exceedingly narrow and partisan. I am happy to say that I have lived long enough and been long enough identified with public affairs to have passed beyond the point when I will refuse to support a measure which I believe to be in itself wise and beneficent simply and only because it is supported or has even been proposed by some man or men with whom I am not politically affiliated. I am free to admit that when a measure comes to me approved by any responsible Republican authority I receive it under suspicion and subject it to the closest scrutiny. I do that as a matter of precaution, having learned from a long experience that it is wise to be wary and cautious in handling whatever comes from that source. However, I have reached the point when I am no longer prepared to say with absolute confidence that nothing good can come out of even this political Nazareth. American statesmanship has indeed fallen to a low plane when men elevated to great official stations, and who are supposed by their constituencies to be big enough to hold the commissions with which they are honored, decide all questions on purely partisan lines, and do this without regard to the merits of any question before them and in spite of the fact that they may believe that some particular proposition submitted to them would promote the general welfare. That is enough to say in that behalf.

But, Mr. President, in this particular instance the most partisan of Democrats need not have any scruple about supporting this measure, for in its essential features it embodies an old and well-recognized Democratic policy. The other day the able and discriminating Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] declared that this bill before the Senate was a Democratic measure, not a Republican measure; and other Republican Senators have made like declarations with equal emphasis. I will not stop to discuss the accuracy of these declarations—by which I mean I will not stop to debate with any Senator whether this reciprocity agreement is more expressive of Democratic Party policy than of Republican Party policy. I do not think that that is of sufficient importance to waste time upon. I do know that great Republican leaders and Republican national conventions in recent years have declared in favor of making reciprocal trade agreements with other countries, and especially with other countries on the Western Hemisphere, and I do know that the Democratic Party has stood against the idea of commercially isolating this country or of unduly circumscribing its commercial opportunities, and has stood for wider and freer trade relations with the balance of the world than we now enjoy or have enjoyed for many years. The Democratic Party has always stood for promoting, within every reasonable limit, the easy interchange of our industrial products with those of other countries, and for that reason, among other reasons, the Democratic Party has opposed levying duties upon imports so high as unnecessarily to embarrass this interchange of products, and has always advocated such trade agreements, especially with American nationalities, as would be reciprocally beneficial. That is an old Democratic doctrine. And so viewing this measure from the standpoint of a Democrat I am bound to say that any effort made by our Government to extend and liberalize the trade relations between this country and Canada or between this country and any of the Republics to the south of us, through the instrumentality of treaties or commercial agreements, or by any legitimate means, would be strictly in line with Democratic policy and precedent. I could not therefore secure my own consent to antagonize any well-considered movement in this direction simply because that particular movement was originated and put in form by a Republican President.

Moreover, Mr. President, I wish to say that in my opinion the question now before the Senate—that is, the Canadian reciprocity agreement—is as nearly a nonpartisan question as we have had before Congress for a long time, and we ought to treat it from that standpoint. In the name of heaven, can we have no question here of a nonpartisan character? If I should speak as a partisan I might say I would have been pleased if this whole matter had been postponed until after the next election, so that it might have been taken up by a Democratic President, and thus had behind it the prestige of a party known to have been always heartily and honestly in favor of the policy of real and wide-reaching commercial reciprocity. If that had been done, I think that an agreement far wider in scope and of far greater meaning and import than the one now before us would have been entered into and submitted to the Congress. However, we have this agreement before us, and although it is imperfect in some respects and falls short of what it should be, I hold that it would be the height of unwisdom to reject it and thus put obstacles in the way and add to the difficulty of future negotiations. I am in favor of unrestricted free trade between Canada and the United States, and I indulge the belief that within the next few years, under a Democratic administration, we will have unrestricted free trade between the Provinces of Canada and the States of this Union. This agreement, negotiated by President Taft, is a step in the right direction, and I congratulate him that, considering his environments, he had the courage and wisdom to take that step. The Democrats of the Senate, acting in harmony with the Democrats of the House of Representatives, will do their part in approving this work of the President. Later on, when we have greater power and opportunity, we will take up the work where the President is compelled to leave it and carry it forward to a fuller and better fruition.

Mr. President, there ought to be absolute freedom, unhampered by burdensome trade restrictions, in the exchange of all things produced in Canada and in the United States. The commercial and trade relations between these States and the Canadian Provinces should be in no essential particular different from that which obtains between our States themselves. Lying there to the north of us is that great empire, rich in natural resources and possessing wonderful industrial possibilities. It is a new country for the most part, but it is growing apace with marvelous rapidity. Good people—industrious, law-abiding, home-loving people—are pouring into Canada from the best countries of Europe and from the United States. Their people and ours are homogeneous and congenial. But Canada is not moving forward unaccompanied. We still have in our Western States vast areas of unsettled and undeveloped territory, and millions of good people are coming to us as well as to Canada from the best countries of the world, and among them thousands are coming from Canada. We grow and grow right along by the side of each other, having the same habits of life, pursuing the same industries in the same way, speaking the same language, akin by blood and fellowship, and having the same civilization upon the same high scale.

Why should we therefore erect arbitrary and unnatural trade barriers between these two peoples? Let Canada grow and grow as fast as possible, and cheer her on, so long as her progress is sound and sane. So will we grow even faster as a whole, even though the per cent of our increase in population and wealth can not be so great. As the tide of Canadian development swells and advances, so will her demand for our products increase. The millions who will come to people her plains and build her towns and cities must buy horses, cattle, and other live stock; must buy farm machinery; must buy structural material; must buy all kind of things from somebody somewhere. It is evident from the very nature of the situation that with free trade between the two countries Canadians would not go across the sea to purchase supplies if they could buy them substantially as cheap almost at the very threshhold of their homes. Nor would we go across the sea to buy what we could better buy in Canada. Free trade between our own States has been one of the boasted and, in fact, one of the greatest blessings of our governmental, economic, and industrial system. We have 46 sovereignties, with 90,000,000 of people, but we are so organized that industrially and commercially we are as one. The rapid development of the newer States of the great West has not retarded the development of the older States. On the contrary this marvelous western development of ours has served to stimulate and accelerate the industrial development of the older Eastern States. So it will be when Canada and the United States clasp hands and move together in the onward march of commercial and industrial achievement. I believe when that day comes it will mark an era of progress that will be set down in history as one of the greatest in the annals of time, and I believe it will, from the start to the end, be equally beneficial to both countries.

When this movement is worked out and this commercial alliance between these two nations consummated there will be a power, and an ever-growing power, here in North America that will stand potential, aye, and dominant, for the advancement of all things most promotive of the world's well-being. This is a great step we are taking in the march of human progress. The Republican President has put himself on the right side of this great progressive movement; the Democratic House of Representatives has put itself in the most emphatic way on the same side; and it would be pitiful indeed if the Senate—and worse than pitiful if the Democrats of the Senate—should stand as a stumbling block across the pathway of this mighty and far-reaching movement.

Mr. President, this is a most inviting theme for discussion and much could be said about it, but in the interest of economizing time I will not further pursue the general and greater aspects of the subject. I turn now to another phase of the question.

It has been asked why a Democratic Senator should vote against the amendments which have been offered to the pending bill, since Democrats almost unanimously agree to the essential features of many of these amendments. Why do Senators on this side stand against such amendments? I will answer that question. In the first place, the House of Representatives, which is the only Democratic body in the whole Government, made a legislative program for this session which we think a wise program. The House of Representatives has taken a course which so far, in our judgment, has received the approval of the country. This is a House bill, and the House refused to amend the bill and passed it unamended by a large majority. Many of the same amendments which have been here proposed were, at least in their essential features, offered in the House—amendments embodying the principal features of bills afterwards separately enacted by the House itself—but were voted down by that body as amendments to this bill.

Mr. President, no one can doubt that a majority of the House of Representatives favored an enlargement of the free list, for the House passed a bill of that kind. No one can doubt that the House of Representatives favored a substantial downward revision of the woolen schedule, for the House passed that kind of a bill. No one can doubt that the House of Representatives favors a downward revision of the cotton schedule and a downward revision of other schedules. Yet that body refused to attach amendments covering those schedules to the reciprocity bill, and in so doing did wisely.

We have thought upon this side—and I believe that to be the general judgment of Democratic Senators—that we should adhere to the program adopted by the Democratic House of Representatives in this particular, because we believe it to be a wise program, and because we believe it has the approval of the American electorate—at least of the Democratic part of the American electorate. Moreover, Mr. President, as the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] said this morning, the amendments proposed have been offered by the enemies of this bill, not one amendment being offered by a friend of the bill. Long ago we were taught to "Beware of Greeks bearing gifts." I do not mean to say that Senators opposed to the measure have offered amendments in bad faith, but, without questioning motives, I think it wise to adhere to the view that it is ordinarily dangerous in legislative procedure to follow the lead of those who desire to defeat the thing you desire yourself to accomplish.

Mr. President, this is a tentative international agreement. The bill before us is not ordinary legislation and does not come before us as such. A tentative agreement has been made between these two countries, and that agreement is submitted in the exact form in which it was made to the legislative bodies of both countries for ratification. It was asked by the representatives of both countries that the agreement as made should in both countries be crystallized into the form of law. To be sure, the legislative body of either Government can modify it, can take from or add to it, and can do that in more ways than one. For instance, we could, on our part, amend it so as to make and require some additional reciprocal concession; and we might, on our part, give to Canada as a gratuity and without consideration something that Canada has not and does not ask for, and this latter, in fact, is what most of these amendments offered by the enemies of the bill propose to do. But, Mr. President, when we once break the line that has stood here in favor of this agreement upon its merits we open the door to a flood of amendments that may pour in and destroy all hope of the agreement being ratified, either by the Congress or the President of the United States or by the Parliament of Canada.

All know that every amendment made to this bill by the Senate must go to the House of Representatives and that the concurrence of the House must be had. If we enter upon the work of adding tariff revision to this reciprocity bill, who knows where it will lead to; and what assurance have we that the House of Representatives will consent to the amendments or that an agreement respecting them could be reached in conference? If we add amendments such as have been proposed and such as would probably follow, what assurance have we that the President, who is a part of the lawmaking power, would consent? Who knows whether he would approve or veto such a bill? If we make wholesale amendments, what assurance have we that the Parliament of Canada will consent to them?

All three of these must agree—that is, the House of Representatives, the President of the United States, and the Government of Canada—or else the agreement falls.

Nor is that all. It has been proposed by some of these amendments to add to this bill some general revision of our tariff laws. It has been proposed to grant to Canada, without consideration, additional trade benefits that Canada did not ask for and which were not embodied in the agreement as made. It has been proposed to grant to Canada the right to bring numerous other articles not covered by the agreement into the United States free or at a reduced rate of duty, and we have been asked why Canada should object to that. For example, under the agreement as made a lower rate of duty is put upon meat than that prescribed by the general law, and a lower rate of duty is put upon flour than that prescribed by the general law, and the same is true with respect to numerous other articles produced in both countries; and the question has been asked why Canada should object to the United States now conceding to her the unrequited privilege of bringing in free of duty these productions of the Dominion upon which the agreement merely lowers the duty. If we saw proper by an additional section to the bill to offer to Canada free entry into our markets for such of her productions as under the agreement are made taxable, it might be that Canada would not object; but it might be that some other country would object if not accorded the same right as to the particular things covered by such concession.

We have commercial agreements or treaties with other nations in which are written what is known as the favored-nation clause—by which I mean we have agreements with other nations to the effect that they shall have the same rights of entry into our markets and of trade with our people that are accorded to the most favored nation. If, without consideration, without a quid pro quo, we should concede to Canada the privilege of entering our markets for this, that, or the other production of that country, entirely outside of this agreement, it seems to me that other nations having commercial treaties with us of the character of which I have spoken, not only could complain, but could charge us with bad faith and with an effort to evade our obligation unless we accorded like concessions to them, and that would lead to endless confusion and to all kinds of international complications.

Mr. President, all such things as these are involved, and those of us who have voted against these amendments have voted in that way, not because in many, perhaps in most, instances we were opposed to the amendments themselves—or opposed to what on their face they proposed to accomplish—but because we were opposed to encumbering this bill with these complications, and thus imperiling not only the passage of this bill, but probably the passage of any and all remedial tariff legislation by this Congress. That was the position taken by the House, and that has been the position of practically all Democratic Senators. Of course we may be mistaken, but we think we are right.

Mr. President, I am for this bill whether we get any other legislation at this session or not. If I knew at this moment that the Senate would refuse to pass the House free-list bill or any free-list bill, or the House woolen bill or any woolen bill, or any other bill revising any tariff schedule, I would still be for this measure on its own merits. I am therefore opposed to saddling this measure with other legislative suggestions or propositions, however seemingly meritorious in themselves, which would, in my opinion, endanger not only the passage of the measure before the Senate, but probably endanger the passage by the Senate of any remedial tariff legislation whatever. When this bill is out of the way we can then take up these other measures and dispose of them. That has been our view on this side of the Chamber. We Democrats who have taken the course I have indicated, and with which the Senate is familiar, will take up these other measures as soon as we have disposed of the one now in hand, and then we will challenge the good faith of those who have manifested such acute anxiety to reform our domestic tariff laws by tacking amendments on to this bill to which they are confessedly opposed. The Democrats of the Senate and the progressive or insurgent Republicans, who profess to be ardently in favor of tariff reductions, are in control of this Senate, if they care to exercise their joint power. We can stay here as long as we want to stay, even if need be until the Christmas bells shall ring, and longer, too; and I am in favor of staying here until legislation such as the country demands, and upon which this great Democratic House of Representatives was chosen, has been enacted. It is said the President called us here for one purpose—to pass this reciprocity bill. That may be, and, if so, it was a good purpose, and I approve what he did; but since we are here I am in favor of staying until we are ready to leave. [Laughter.] We will pass this bill; but we will take our own time, without reference to the wish or the pleasure of the Executive or anybody else, and stay here until we think the time has come to adjourn. The will and welfare of the people are more important than that of the President. It is now up to our insurgent—I beg pardon, I mean our progressive—Republican friends.

I have been accused, along with my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and others, with being in some sort of alliance with the White House. Well, I do not deny it; it is not worth denying.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume the Senator from Missouri means in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says we were accused in a Pickwickian sense. Well, it is this sort of an alliance: I am for this bill—for this reciprocity agreement—and in supporting it I am with the President. I approve of what he has done, and I am supporting, not the President, but the measure, and would be for it whether he were for it or against it. I think the fact that he is for it is a cause for congratulation, and if his great influence can sway some of his Republican brethren to vote for this wise measure, which is essentially a Democratic measure, promotive of a great international movement of inestimable value to the English-speaking race, so much the better; but as soon as this bill is disposed of I apprehend that my "alliance with the President" will terminate. [Laughter.] Of course I hope not. I am taunted with the charge that this is the President's bill. If so, then, since I am supporting "his bill" so ardently, I shall be delighted if the President, reciprocally, shall support some of the Democratic House bills reducing the excesses of tariff duties under the present law and lend his great influence to secure their passage.

Mr. President, the most persistent objection I have heard urged against this bill has come from such Senators as my friend from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who have expressed the fear that the passage of this bill is going to be detrimental to the farmers of the country. I do not agree with that view. I do not believe this bill will injure the farmers. On the contrary, I think it will be generally helpful. In a speech I delivered here several weeks ago I showed so conclusively as to close that phase of the controversy that in two of the three particulars in which it was at first claimed the agricultural interests of the country would be harmed the claim was absolutely groundless. It had been contended that if this agreement passed the wages of farm laborers in the United States would be forced down by sharp competition with the cheaper labor of Canada; but in the speech to which I have alluded I showed so clearly that it has not since been denied that farm labor in Canada, taken as a whole, is higher than it is in the United States. The wages paid in the three eastern Provinces, as compared with the wages paid in our extreme Eastern States, taken as a whole for the entire year, are somewhat lower; but from Ontario on westward to the Pacific the average wage paid in Canada is greater than that paid in the United States, or even in the States bordering on Canada.

At the beginning of this debate it was also contended that if this reciprocity agreement should be ratified it would injure the farmers by reducing the selling value of their live stock, resulting from the free admission into our markets of the cheaper horses, cattle, and so forth, of Canada. That was the argument. But in the speech to which I have referred I disposed of that bugaboo by showing that all kinds of live stock, taken as a whole, command higher prices in Canada than in the United States. I showed that so conclusively that the contrary contention has been abandoned by the opponents of this bill.

But it has been also insisted that this agreement, if ratified, will injure the farmers by letting Canadian cereals, wheat in particular, into our markets free of duty; and that contention is still maintained. I believe I can demonstrate that there is no more danger from this reciprocity agreement to the wheat raiser than there is danger from it to the cattle raiser or the farm laborer; but I hardly feel able to go into that to-day, for it would involve the consideration of the production and consumption of wheat—supply and demand, exports and imports—and it would require considerable time to cover the ground satisfactorily.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STONE. It also involves a consideration of the different markets, foreign and domestic, and the effect of those markets upon our prices, and I do not believe that I have the strength to undertake that task to-day. It would necessarily prolong my speech for an hour or more, and as I am not well to-day, I fear the effort would overtax my vitality.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate the fact that the Senator from Missouri has already indicated that he is making this address under difficulties, not being well, and I would not interfere for the purpose of getting into any discussion with him over any proposition.

I only wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri, inasmuch as he has referred to the Senator from North Dakota and then controverted a proposition which might be taken to be a proposition that had emanated from the Senator from North Dakota, that the Senator from North Dakota has never contended either that the price of machinery or that the cost of labor was less in western Canada than it is in the western United States; but, on the contrary, he agrees with the Senator from Missouri that those prices are slightly greater in Canada than in the United States. Neither have I ever contended that Canadian horses and cattle would come down into our country; but in my address upon the subject, as the Senator from Missouri would have noted had he been present, I stated that for a number of years we will be exporting horses into Canada and undoubtedly cattle into Canada also, because that western country is developing rapidly and the demand for horses is growing more rapidly than colts will grow into horses.

The situation is somewhat similar to that in the State of North Dakota 20 years ago. At that time we imported an immense number of horses, but to-day we are exporting them. So, in the development of the Canadian northwest there will be a constant market, in my opinion, for the importation of some American horses; but while those horses will go there to open up the country, that which will come as a result from the opening up of the country will not stay there, but must find a market, and the greater the development and the more the demand for our horses to develop the country the greater will be the product of that great northwest which must find a market.

The only respect in which the Senator and I differ, so far as his argument relates to the Canadian northwest, is in the statement which, as I have said, I have demonstrated with mathematical accuracy, that the prices are very much higher on the American side in places equally distant from the great terminal markets than on the Canadian side, and that as soon as this reciprocity agreement goes into effect the Canadian northwest must be a heavy exporter in comparison with her population, in that our prices must meet the Canadian prices and that they will both go down to an export basis. While we agree upon the first two propositions, I want to say to the Senator that we part only upon the third proposition.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I know we are parted there. I know that the Senator believes that the passage of this bill and the acceptance of the agreement by the Canadian Parliament will result in harm to the wheat growers of North Dakota. That is a subject, as I have said, I had intended to enter upon to-day, but I do not now feel as if I should undertake it. Before the tariff debate is ended, possibly when we take up the free-list bill, I will take occasion to present my view of this wheat question to the Senate, and I shall then hope to have the honor of the presence of the Senator from North Dakota.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that most of the Senators who are opposing this bill themselves believe that it will result in any substantial injury to the farmers of the country. The junior Senator from Iowa made a statement substantially to that effect in his address here to-day; and yet he is going to vote against the bill because he says he is afraid it might do some harm. Some Senators seem to be afflicted with a nightmare, and reciprocity appears in their distempered dreams as some gaunt ghost-wolf stalking around in moonless nights hunting farmers to devour. I wish I could awaken them and scatter these disturbing visions.

The Senator from North Dakota says that as we send more and more of our horses and cattle and farm machinery into Canada we but supply the means of increasing the production of Canadian wheat, which must find a market somewhere. All that is true, but then we will be at the same time increasing our own production of wheat also and relatively in like proportion. Have no fear but that there will be markets for all the wheat produced. North Dakota is directly tributary to the greatest milling center of the world, Minneapolis. North Dakota raises a fine, high grade of wheat, but her finest and highest grades of wheat are only a part of her production. No. 1 northern, for example, represents only a part of the production of the great wheat fields of North Dakota. North Dakota produces, as do many other States, some high-grade wheat, some medium-grade wheat, and some low-grade wheat. The mills of Minneapolis alone are capable of consuming about 100,000,000 bushels of wheat per year; and the other mills of the Northwest, tributary and contiguous to Minneapolis, have an almost equal consuming capacity. The mills of that section alone can more than consume every bushel of wheat raised in Minnesota and the two Dakotas, and yet there are vigorous competitors elsewhere for the higher grades of wheat produced in those States. Milwaukee is a great milling center; Buffalo is a milling center; New York is a milling center; and all these and other centers want and must have the best grades of hard northern spring wheat. They must have it, and they compete with each other for it. Minneapolis, however, is the greatest flour-milling center of this country and of the world, and the Minnesota mills have succeeded in establishing a reputation for their flour above every other flour produced in the United States, and it commands a higher price in Glasgow and other European markets than any other American flour. But, Mr. President, this flour is not made wholly of the highest grades of wheat raised in the Dakotas and Minnesota. It is made of mixed wheat. It is the product of a blend. All of the great millers at Minneapolis and of that region employ chemists—expert chemists—to study out and discover the best possible mixtures of wheat that will produce the highest and best grades of flour. They take the lower grades and mix them with the higher grades, and, by scientific experiments, work out the best results. The Milwaukee mills buy the hard winter wheat of Kansas and other Middle States for mixing purposes. Therefore, every additional bushel of hard northern wheat that can be furnished to the mills of Minneapolis, Milwaukee, and other great milling centers will call for an additional amount of other wheat of different grades and lower price for mixing purposes; and so when you create an opportunity for a larger absorption of the highest grade of wheat raised in our Northwestern States and in the northwestern Provinces of Canada, you also create a wider market for other wheat—such wheat as we raise in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, and other States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. STONE. Pardon me just a moment, and then I will yield.

Mr. President, they raise spring wheat in Iowa, in Wisconsin, and in other States, but that wheat is not, as the Senator knows, in grade and quality up to the level of the high-grade wheat produced in a part of Minnesota and in the two Dakotas; it is below the standard of the more northern product. Nevertheless it is a wheat that goes into these great milling centers and is there mixed with the other higher grades. The more of the best quality of this northern wheat there is to grind in our mills, the greater will be the demand for the other kinds of wheat to mix with it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator contend that a better grade of flour is obtained by mixing grain from the more southern States with the northern wheat? Is it the purpose of the mixture to get a better grade of flour?

Mr. STONE. I assume it to be; or rather it is to produce substantially as good flour at less expense.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; let me correct the Senator right there.

Mr. STONE. What is the purpose?

Mr. McCUMBER. The reason for it is that they can not get enough of the higher grade of No. 1 northern in that section and therefore in order to keep the mills going fully, they must mix a certain percentage of the wheat they get farther south. When Canada has free trade with this country the mills of Minneapolis then, without paying any tariff, can supply their entire demand for No. 1 northern or northern, whether it is No. 1 or No. 2, and they will not use any of this other grain for mixing purposes. The chemists of whom the Senator speaks are employed simply to examine that wheat and see how much of the grain raised farther south, in Iowa and other States, can be mixed with the higher grade wheat without lowering the grade of the flour; but the millers would not take a bushel of that wheat if they could get high-grade grain from Canada to supply their needs.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am almost tempted to open up this matter and go into it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall not ask the Senator to do that.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from North Dakota says that expert chemists are employed to examine different wheats, apply tests, and find out how much of the wheat raised in States farther south can be mixed with the higher-grade northern wheat without lowering the grade of the flour. Undoubtedly that is true, and my information is that the blending of these different wheats—blended scientifically and after most careful study and experiment—produces a flour as good as the unmixed northern wheat itself will produce. The Minneapolis flour has a higher reputation, both at home and abroad, than any other American flour, but it is made of mixed wheat. Will the millers of Minneapolis cease to make that kind of flour? Why should these millers give up what they have been doing and start into making flour exclusively out of No. 1 northern wheat at a much higher cost to them when they could make as good a flour out of the mixed wheat at less cost? They will not stop making the same kind of flour they are making now. As the supply of wheat is increased the grinding capacity of the mills will be increased, and there is no danger that the supply will ever exceed the demand. The world must have bread. What good reason would a miller have for paying a dollar a bushel for wheat and separately grinding the whole of that into flour when he might mix it with other wheat costing, say, 90 cents per bushel, and thus produce a flour practically as good and worth as much? My figures as to the price of wheat—$1 for one grade and 90 cents for another grade—are, of course, arbitrary, and are used merely for purposes of illustration. The rule and the argument would apply whether the prices per bushel should be stated at one sum or another.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply say that there will be no occasion for his getting any of the lower-grade wheat after this bill passes, because the Canadian grain will then supply his market and he will be able to buy the one grade practically as low as the other.

Mr. STONE. That is impossible, for wheat then, as now, will be valued according to its grade. Quality will always be an important element in determining value. This reciprocity agreement can not at least change that omnipotent rule. As well might you say that if we had free trade in horses between the United States and Mexico the free introduction of Mexican bronchos would bring American thoroughbreds down to their level. The Senator's position is untenable.

But, Mr. President, I am not now going further into that subject. I simply can not do so. Moreover, if it were possible to convince the Senator from North Dakota that the farmers would not be hurt by this reciprocity bill, I would hesitate to do so at this juncture. I think he is under a delusion, but may be it is better to leave him in his present mental state, at least for the time being, for he has said if this bill passes he will stay here until the ides of November, and later if necessary, and do his best to take off some of the tariff duties on the things the farmer buys and consumes. I would not shake him in that purpose if I could, for in doing that he would render the farmers a real service. I shall wait anxiously until next week and the week after to see the manifestation of that bold spirit in action. I would not, if I could, stand in the way of this onward movement of the Senator in favor of tariff reduction on the things the farmer buys.

Mr. President, I have never believed, and do not now believe, that the tariff has ever been or can be of benefit to the American farmers taken as a whole. I am happy to be confirmed in that view by several distinguished Republican Senators. I will at this point read some extracts from speeches made by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], in which they declare in the most emphatic terms that the tariff has never been a source of profit or benefit to the American farmer. I shall read these merely as striking manifestations of progressive thought even among stalwart protection Republicans. Here is what the Senator from Minnesota said only two years ago during the debate on the Payne-Aldrich bill:

I desire to tell the Senator—

Answering a question propounded to him by Senator BORAH—

I desire to tell the Senator that the tariff on wheat which is on the statute books has not done us a particle of good. It would be like a tariff on cotton. Up to this time we have been exporting some 150,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. The price of our wheat is fixed by the Liverpool price—the export price—and no duty up to this time has helped us.

And during this session of Congress, and during this very debate, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] made this enlightening confession:

* * * I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer. They have been quite indifferent, affecting only several localities here and there, so long as our production ran far ahead of our consumption. But, with the increase of our cities as compared with our farming population and the using up of our waste lands and the fencing in of old cattle ranges and the reduction of the productive power of our land, we have about come to the point where the continuance of those duties, instead of being a matter of indifference to the people of the country, would result in putting up the cost of food.

Mr. President, this is what we Democrats have been preaching for lo, these many years; and I want to say here and now that when leading Republicans are beginning to talk this way I dislike to see any Democratic Senator or Democratic Member of the House take up the old Republican slogan, when Republicans themselves are beginning to cast it off. I do not like to see Democrats rush in to renew a battle for protection at any point from which Republicans themselves are retreating.

Mr. President, during the course of this debate on Canadian reciprocity I have heard much said by opponents of the measure about the farmers. The farmers are put forward and an effort is made to use them by other interests to defeat this legislation. It has been assumed by some that this reciprocity agreement is in the nature of an assault upon the prosperity and well-being of the American farmer; and some have been so intemperate as almost to charge the President with a deliberate purpose to promote the prosperity of Canadian agriculture at the expense of the American farmer, and with charging the House of Representatives with being privy to that arrangement and particeps criminis in carrying it out. I have been astounded to hear an occasional Democrat join in this hue and cry and labor with might and main to make our farmers believe that if they would prosper they must lean upon and depend upon a protective tariff. Strange Democratic doctrine that! In fact, Mr. President, during the progress of this debate I have heard and read many remarkable utterances, and some of the most remarkable have come from most unexpected sources. As a rule I do not agree with the political views of the President or his party, but in negotiating this Canadian reciprocity agreement I feel that the President performed an act of wise and farseeing statesmanship—an act that will link his name with a policy which, successfully carried out, will constitute one of the brightest pages in our history. For the part done by the President and for the part done by the Democratic House of Representatives I extend to both my hearty congratulations.

Mr. President, how can any sane man declare, much less believe, that the President of the United States or that the House of Representatives would deliberately concoct a scheme or connive at a policy intended to promote the welfare of a foreign state at the expense of our own people or of any large class or number of our own people? How can any man dare to say a thing like that? I will not defend the President or the House or myself against a charge or insinuation of that character. I prefer to pass it by as the distempered vaporing of men bereft of reason, or of men who have allowed some sudden upheaval of passion, some vaulting ambition, some gnawing envy, or some other unworthy thing to sweep them off their feet and away from the base of good judgment and common justice. Why, sir, this idea, so sedulously propagated, that the President or the House or the Senate would conspire to promote any scheme, or would tolerate any scheme, intended to advance the well-being of another people at the expense of our own is so preposterous as to be worse than ludicrous. Why should I, for instance, give aid to anything I had reason to believe was calculated to work an injury to American farmers? And yet, because during the hearings of the Senate Finance Committee I presumed to ask some questions and inquire into some mysterious and shady-looking performances, I have been accused of insulting the farmers by a few men assuming especial authority to represent them. I have been referred to by these men as the enemy of the farmers, and have been threatened with their displeasure. Again I ask, why would I want to offend or injure the farmers? I was born and reared on a farm. My ancestors for generations back and most of my kindred on both sides were farmers—not theoretical and fanciful farmers, but real farmers, who lived and worked on their farms and personally superintended them. I married a country girl in the house where she was born and reared on a Missouri farm. Her ancestors on both sides for generations, like my own, were farmers. During the greater part of my life my estate has been chiefly represented in farms I owned and upon which I lived a good part of the time. My whole life has been intimately identified with farms and with agriculture. I am bound to that class of our people above all others by ties of blood, interest, gratitude, and affection. I know the farmers better than I know any other people, because I was raised among them, bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh, and have lived by far the greater part of my life in their midst. They have been among my best friends, and from their hands I have received my greatest honors. No, Mr. President, the farmers are the last people at whom I would strike a blow, and, God being my judge, they are the last people I will permit others to delude, deceive, or injure, so far as I have power to prevent it. Mr. President, there has been an effort made to delude and mislead them, as well as to delude and mislead other people. A strenuous and long-continued attempt has been made to convince the Senate, the House, and the President that the farmers of the country are in revolt, in widespread and vehement opposition, to the reciprocity agreement. I do not believe it.

The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has been misled by this manufactured clamor, and has shown a disposition to back away from his former and better position. The other day he brought in here and had laid on his desk a pile of petitions as big as a small haystack. It was the same pile of petitions Mr. Collins and his associates laid before the Finance Committee. These petitions were in the nature of protests made by Minnesota farmers, and presented by Mr. Collins, against the passage of this bill. They were brought from the Finance Committee room to the Senate Chamber. The same bundle of petitions or protests was lugged into the Finance Committee room and there displayed, so far as the staging would permit, with the same dramatic and theatrical effect as was attempted on this floor. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] had two men put the bundle on their shoulders and bring it here into the Senate Chamber and solemnly lay it on his desk. We were told that the names of 30,000 Minnesota farmers were affixed to those protests. But, Mr. President, before we stampede, suppose we open up that bundle of protests and examine it. Minnesota is a great State. Thirty thousand farmers constitute but a comparatively small per cent of all the farmers of that Commonwealth. The movement to get up these petitions was projected and the work was principally done by one man in Minnesota, Mr. P. V. Collins, editor of the Northwestern Agriculturist, published at Minneapolis. Mr. Collins is a nice gentleman, a man of culture, a good citizen. He is also a fine editor of a fine paper, and, as he declared, is a farmer, too—a farmer who works his farm with his brain rather than with his hands." He took it upon himself as a great civic duty to stir up the farmers of Minnesota against reciprocity. He testified that he had done everything he could to promote in Minnesota this outburst of agricultural protest against reciprocity. His paper, he said, is taken by one-third of all the farmers of that State—that is to say, between 50,000 and 60,000—and he appealed to them through his paper week after week to wage war against Canadian reciprocity. Supplementing these appeals he got up petitions or remonstrances against reciprocity and circulated them broadcast through the State, using the secretaries of every agricultural organization in the State, and using other agencies also, to circulate them. After weeks of strenuous effort he got, so he says, 30,000 farmers out of 155,000 Minnesota farmers to sign his petitions. That bundle of petitions is the bundle Mr. Collins lugged into the Finance Committee room, and the same which the senior Senator from Minnesota piled up as a formidable display on his desk here the other day. Thirty thousand—one out of between five and six of the farmers of Minnesota. But even these 30,000 were not all farmers; in fact a great many were not farmers. Mr. President, there were some amusing things about this performance. Mr. Collins organized a delegation and brought it here to voice the indignant protests of the farmers of Minnesota. I will ask Senators to read Mr. Collins's testimony, which I will print as part of these remarks. This delegation was composed of nine men, with Mr. Collins at the head. After his mighty effort to arouse the farmers of Minnesota and induce them to sign a protest against this trade agreement, and after appointing a delegation to present the protests, he then undertook the task of raising money to pay the expenses of the delegation to Washington. According to his own admission he spent $98.10 for postage, and so forth, in sending out circulars and working up sentiment and in appealing to the farmers for contributions to pay the expenses of a delegation to come here to impress the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the Senate itself, with the hostile view of the farmers of Minnesota respecting this agreement. After spending nearly $100 in spreading these supplications among the farmers for financial aid he succeeded in raising the gross sum of $389.25. The net proceeds of his energetic labors in this behalf amounted to about $280 or $290, or an average of less than one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the amount raised was paid by each of the 155,000 farmers of the State, or about one-fourth of a cent per head. Some one, I do not know who, sent me a copy of Mr. Collins's publication, The Northwestern Agriculturist, in which he printed a report he made to the delegation he had selected to come to Washington showing how much money he had been able to collect to pay the expenses of the delegation, and showing who the generous contributors were to this patriotic fund, and he printed that report in his paper so that everybody would know just what had been done. Among other things the report showed who had contributed to the fund. It might be interesting to read a little of the testimony of Mr. Collins on that point. I will print it more in extenso, but I will read a part of it for the present edification of the Senate. I read as follows from my examination of him on that subject:

Senator STONE. Mr. Collins, I understood you to say that the farmers of Minnesota are very enthusiastic in opposition to this reciprocity agreement.

Mr. COLLINS. More than that, they are vehement.

Senator STONE. I did not understand you.

Mr. COLLINS. They are more than that; they are vehement in opposition—they are bitter.

Senator STONE. And practically unanimous?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Enthusiastic, vehement, and unanimous.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Enthusiastic, vehement, and unanimous?

Mr. COLLINS. And bitter.

Senator STONE. And bitter. I have here before me a sheet taken from The Northwestern Agriculturist of May 6, 1911. The Northwestern Agriculturist is the paper you publish?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. On this sheet I find a rather interesting statement showing the responses that were made on an appeal sent out by you for contributions to pay the expenses of this delegation down to Washington to protest against this reciprocity agreement. It appears from this statement that the total amount you were able to collect up to May the 6th was $389.25, and that you paid out $98.10 for collecting that.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Leaving a net collection of $291.15.

Mr. COLLINS. We divided the boodle last night, gentlemen, and each of us received $50 out of the funds that had been collected so far. That $98 had not yet borne fruit. It takes a little time for fruit to ripen, especially on farms. The funds will come in. We have faith in the farmers behind us; but if they do not, we will pay our own bills.

Senator STONE. It seems that $111 of this sum was contributed by bankers?

This question was based on his published report. Here is the answer:

Mr. COLLINS. Bankers, country banks owned by farmers.

Senator STONE. Ninety-seven dollars and twenty-five cents was contributed by creameries, $41.25 by elevators, and $50 by a fire insurance company.

Mr. COLLINS. That is a farmers' fire insurance company. The Farmers' Cooperative Fire Insurance Co.

Senator STONE. Ninety-eight dollars by individuals, running from $5 down to 25 cents each; $5 by a market company, and the remainder by societies of equity.

Now, the point I desire to call your attention to is that if the farmers of Minnesota contributed practically nothing to this $389 fund, the response from the farmers was not very liberal to send a delegation down here to protest against the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. COLLINS. That is an unfair statement.

Senator STONE. Neither enthusiastic, vehement, unanimous, nor bitter.

Mr. COLLINS. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that all of that came from farmers. The farmers are the bankers; the farmers are behind the Cooperative Fire Insurance Co.; the farmers are the men that run the creameries.

These contributions, then, were from organizations of farmers, not individual farmers, even if all Mr. Collins says were true. They were directly made by banks, insurance companies, creameries, societies of equity, and so forth, in which farmers—at least some farmers—are interested. But the great body of the real farmers individually contributed nothing.

Senator STONE. These 30,000 men, out of 155,000 farmers, who signed this petition, were willing to take their lead pencils and attach their names to a petition, but were not willing to contribute to pay the expenses of your delegation.

Mr. COLLINS. They will be equally willing to put their cross on the ballot.

That is the answer. It is a great answer, and so let it stand.

But—

I said—

it would seem to me, I submit to you, Mr. Collins, that if the farmers of Minnesota were so unanimously and vehemently opposed to this agreement, that they would have contributed something toward paying the expenses of a delegation which they had appointed, according to this newspaper of yours, to send down here to represent them in opposing this agreement before the Senate Finance Committee.

And especially so as he had expended a hundred dollars for postage in making appeals for contributions in addition to the appeals he made week after week through his newspaper. Quoting from the record he answered me as follows:

Mr. COLLINS. There is not any question, Senator, but that every penny I have paid out will be reimbursed by the farmers by voluntary subscriptions; they are slow, but they are reliable, and this very situation, gentlemen, answers the report that was conveyed to me from the editor of the American Economist.

Senator STONE. It is a kind of slow enthusiasm. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLLINS. The report was circulated here in Washington that P. V. Collins is being backed by the robber barons, whoever they are. Those are the robber barons.

Senator BAILEY. I want to ask you if it is a fair way to measure the enthusiasm of farmers by the size of their contributions?

Mr. COLLINS. It is absolutely ridiculous.

Senator STONE. You say that it is absolutely ridiculous, and yet you, as the spokesman and head of this movement, prepared and sent out petitions to the farmers to sign, and to make contributions to pay these expenses, and urged them to do so in your newspaper?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, I do not wonder that the farmers hesitated to put up. Their contributions were practically nil. In fact these meager contributions came from the banks, the elevator companies, the market places, and others of that kind, but Mr. Collins says that all these are in fact owned by the farmers. The 30,000 farmers out of the 155,000 farmers of Minnesota who signed their names to these petitions contributed nothing, or practically nothing, to the delegation expense fund. It was, indeed, a slow kind of enthusiasm, although, according to Mr. Collins and those who accompanied him, it was nevertheless vehement, bitter, and unanimous.

I am not surprised that the farmers were slow in contributing. I asked Mr. Collins concerning the personnel of the delegation he brought down here. I asked if there were any bankers among them? He answered that there was no banker on the delegation. I asked if Mr. Meaghen, a member of the delegation, was not a banker, and he then answered that he was; and Mr. Meaghen himself broke in to say, "I will have my inning on that question a little later. I am a bank president." Another delegate was a State official who had been a long time in the public service. Another was an ex-general attorney of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and Collins himself was an editor. It is no wonder that the farmers were slow to contribute.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the farmers of Minnesota are generally opposed to this reciprocity agreement. I have too high an estimate of their intelligence and patriotism to believe that. Moreover, the information I have is to the contrary. I believe what sentiment there is against it in Minnesota has been worked up by mistaken and misguided men. What I am saying about Minnesota is equally true of Michigan. I say this in the presence of the junior Senator from that State, who honors me with his attention. There has been some display made here in regard to Michigan, not dissimilar to that made with respect to Minnesota.

The senior Senator from that State [Mr. SMITH] has been having occasional antireciprocity letters received by him read and put in the RECORD. I heard the governor of that State say before the Committee on Finance that he had recently been traversing the State, and said he thought he was familiar with the public sentiment there, and then said he did not agree that the majority of the farmers of Michigan were against reciprocity. I am stating the substance of what he said as I recall it. I saw a letter the other day from the speaker of the House of Representatives of the Michigan Legislature, who is himself a farmer and a high officer of the State grange of Michigan. He declared in that letter that the farmers of Michigan are in favor of this reciprocity agreement, and not against it. If I may venture to make the suggestion, I would like to hear the opinion of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] on that subject.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STONE. I will be delighted to hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am very well satisfied that a great many farmers of Michigan are sincerely opposed to reciprocity. I am not at all satisfied that a majority of them are opposed to it. I know that the speaker of the Michigan House of Representatives, Mr. Baker, a Republican and a protectionist, and one of the executive officers of the grange of our State, insists that a majority of the farmers of Michigan are in favor of the bill now before the Senate. He has a better opportunity for knowing the sentiment than I have, although I have heard from many in opposition to the measure. I might say also that recently I received a letter from a gentleman who is an inspector in the employ of the Michigan State Tax Commission, and he reports that he has made a canvass in the counties where he has been at work among the people—farmers and other taxpayers—and he advises me that an overwhelming majority of the farmers he has seen are in favor of the Canadian reciprocity bill now under consideration.

Mr. STONE. That is excellent. And now, Mr. President, there is one other thing I desire to say about this working up of public sentiment among farmers against reciprocity, and that has relation to the firm of Allen & Graham, of New York City. Do you know who Allen & Graham are? They have had charge and control of the National Grange campaign against reciprocity, under the employment of and in conjunction with ex-Gov. Bachelder, of New Hampshire, master of the National Grange, and of Mr. Aaron Jones, of Indiana, master of the Indiana State Grange and a former master of the National Grange—of these two in particular and of two or three others cooperating with them. Who are Allen & Graham? They are professional lobbyists residing in New York City—legislative lobbyists. They have been frequently engaged by numerous interests to put legislation through Congress or to defeat it. They have, or, at least, Mr. Allen, the senior member of the firm, has had, among his clientele the Standard Oil Co., the Cottonseed Oil Trust, and the Whisky Trust, and other clients of like kind and character. They have been frequently employed by large manufacturing interests to come to Washington to promote legislative ends. These men seem in some way to have hypnotized National Master Bachelder and ex-National Master Aaron Jones and others, who are now, and for a long time have been, at the head of the national organization of the Grange. I have had a suspicion for a good while that Mr. Bachelder and Mr. Jones were trying to misuse the National Grange for political purposes. That is a bold statement, perhaps, but I believe it to be true, and I take the full responsibility of making it. I think they have been trying covertly to use the grange organization to teach the farmers of the country who are connected with it that protection is best for them, and to indoctrinate them with protectionism and Republicanism. These men are intense protectionists and Republicans, and all their environments are of that kind. For years they have headed a coterie that has successfully schemed to control the organization of the National Grange. Their political connections and their course of conduct show that they have been using the power and opportunity their positions in the grange give to them to make Republicans and protectionists out of the American farmers. Nevertheless I was surprised, in fact astounded, that this firm of New York lobbyists should have worked themselves so deeply into the confidence of these high grange officials as to seem to direct the legislative policy of that great and honorable organization.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Are either of them lawyers?

Mr. STONE. No; they are not lawyers. I asked them the question when they were before the Finance Committee, and each of them confessed that he was not a lawyer. They never even pretended to be lawyers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They said they were simply legislative promoters.

Mr. STONE. Yes; they said they were legislative promoters.

Mr. President, often while using the name of the Grange to further their ends they were in the employ of other people—that is, great interests on the outside had them hired to come here to get through legislation—and they were permitted by National Master Bachelder and his official associates to come here and use the name of the grange in the promotion of their legislative work and to shelter themselves under the name of that great farmers' organization.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I am not mistaken—the Senator from Missouri has been over the testimony since I have been, as is evident——

Mr. STONE. I have it right here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In one part of the testimony I think Mr. Bachelder confessed, and that they themselves confessed, that in some cases where they came down ostensibly to represent the grange they were paid by some other interests.

Mr. STONE. Yes; more than once. For example, they came here to promote what is known as "good roads legislation." Gov. Bachelder said it was legislation in which the grange was interested, and that they had employed this firm to come here to promote that legislation; and yet Bachelder admitted and Graham admitted that the grange had never paid them a penny for their service, but Graham also confessed that his firm had received munificent compensation from other sources. From whom? From the manufacturers of automobiles and other vehicles. They were being paid by such interests as these to induce Congress to appropriate money to make great highways, not for farmers or for the benefit of the general public, but for the great motoring cars that go hissing and screaming along our highways. I am not objecting to the automobile; it is a great invention and is all right in its way. What I object to is that the officials of the National Grange would allow men employed by these great manufacturing interests to use the name of the grange to cover up what they were doing and to conceal the real source of their employment.

The denatured-alcohol bill furnishes another example of like kind. Again Allen & Graham used the name of the grange to get this bill through, and they got it through. Graham admitted on the stand that he did not receive a dollar from the grange—that is, from the Bachelder and Jones organization—but that his firm did receive a large fee from manufacturers and others interested in that bill, among them being the Whisky Trust. The Whisky Trust was a generous contributor to the fund raised to pay Allen & Graham for their lobby service, but the grange did not pay a cent. Bachelder and Jones only permitted Allen & Graham to use the name of that honorable organization to advance the ends of the Whisky Trust and other opulent and potent interests.

I have not time to read the testimony of Bachelder, Allen, and Graham before the Finance Committee, but I ask, Mr. President, that I may insert the essential features of it as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, such permission is granted.

Mr. STONE. I will insert the testimony of the gentlemen named, and also that of Mr. Collins, at the end of my remarks. I will do this so that Senators may read this very interesting and instructive lesson as to the different ways of accelerating public opinion.

Mr. President, who managed this grange propaganda against reciprocity? I wonder if the farmers of the country, when they received package after package of literature against reciprocity, knew that that literature was prepared by Allen & Graham in their offices in William Street, New York, and within 100 feet of Wall Street. Well, it was. Not only did they get it up, but much of it was untrue and misleading. It was developed during the hearings that some of the statistics they sent out were absolutely unreliable—so unreliable, in fact, that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who wanted to save the face of these people as well as he could, admitted the inaccuracy of some of their statements, and Allen himself admitted they were wrong. And yet these false statistics were sent out under the name of the National Grange and under the prestige of its authority. On February 11, 1911, Mr. Aaron Jones, ex-master of the National Grange, and present master of the Indiana State Grange, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the other House and read a speech in opposition to reciprocity. Let me read an extract from that address:

I appear on behalf of the National Grange, the principal farm organization of the country, with local branches in 30 States, to record our emphatic protest against the proposed reciprocity arrangement with Canada. I have been a working farmer all my life; have been actively identified with the Grange or Patrons of Husbandry for more than 20 years, and was for 8 years master of the National Grange. I have gone among the farmers in every State of the Union, and have met thousands of them at various State and National Grange meetings. I am thoroughly familiar with their views on this and other public questions, and I am here to declare that the farmers of the country are unalterably opposed to the reciprocity bill which you are now considering, and that they believe it would inflict a serious and permanent injury to their industry.

The principle on which the protective policy has been defended during the past 20 years is that all classes and interests of the country should receive equal protection against the competition of foreign products. It was to carry out this principle that the duties on farm products were imposed by the McKinley law, and reimposed by the Dingley and Payne Tariff Acts. Had it not been for the tariff on farm products the protective system would long ago have been abolished.

I wonder if the Ways and Means Committee knew when they sat listening to those eloquent utterances of Mr. Jones that they had been prepared for him by a couple of noted legislative lobbyists within a step of the Stock Exchange of New York? This speech was afterwards circulated by Allen, Graham and Bachelder throughout the country under inspiring headlines set in display type and prepared by Allen & Graham. I wonder if the farmers to whom this speech was sent were acquainted with its authorship when they received it?

Mr. President, since the Senate hearings were concluded several weeks ago, Mr. Graham has bobbed up again; this time in Canada. Having exhausted his efforts to arouse the American farmers, he seeks now to stir the Canadian electorate into mutiny. "No pent-up Utica confines his powers." He is ubiquitous and universal. I have here a letter that he recently addressed to the Montreal Star, and I desire to read an extract from that letter. I read as follows:

* * * * * * *

I have long been an advocate of free-trade relations between Canada and the United States, and would welcome free trade between both countries. The pending bill, however, is not an honest reciprocal arrangement, but merely a political scheme, intended to secure the support and indorsement of the newspapers of this country for the Taft administration, which was repudiated, and deservedly repudiated, by an immense majority at the election last November.

* * * * * * *

I have been a resident of New York for more than 20 years, and have been actively engaged during a part of that time in newspaper work, but in all my experience I have never known of such a bare-faced conspiracy by the great and wealthy newspapers to promote their own financial interests.

While the reciprocity movement in this country is therefore purely a newspaper conspiracy for free print paper, I am satisfied that the real object in the minds of the President's advisers in this matter is the creation of a sentiment that will ultimately lead to the annexation of Canada to the United States.

I have been, as you are aware, closely identified with political matters, and was at one time in the service of the Department of State. I have known for a long time of the strong sentiment among public men in favor of the annexation of Canada, and you will doubtless remember the organization called the Continental Union, which was started in this city a few years ago, of which many prominent public men were members, the avowed object being the creation of a sentiment favorable to Canadian annexation.

The belief that Canada must ultimately be annexed is everywhere talked of in certain financial circles, particularly among the great financial interests which realize Canada's immense natural resources and the great opportunity for exploitation along the lines which have built up the gigantic trusts and monopolies in this country.

Speaker CLARK, of the House of Representatives, one of the leading Democrats in the country, who may be the Democratic candidate for President next year, simply told the truth in his speech in Congress when he said that he favored reciprocity because he looked forward to the time when the Stars and Stripes would wave over both countries.

Gov. Osborne, of Michigan, testified before the Senate Committee on Finance that he was in favor of reciprocity because he thought it would lead to the annexation of Canada, and numerous other witnesses before that committee expressed the same idea. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the real purpose of the reciprocity scheme is to weaken the influence of Great Britain in Canada and to bring about closer relations with this country that will result in political union.

Before leaving Nova Scotia I was inclined to favor annexation, but my long residence in this country has given me knowledge of the corrupt political methods which prevail both in State and National Legislatures and has caused me to change my views, so that I am now convinced that the Canadians are far better off under their own Government than they would be as a part of the United States. * * * I know the people of Nova Scotia pretty well, and I do not believe that they are ready to sacrifice their political independence for the sake of some slight benefits which this country will be forced to give them in any case in the near future.

The reciprocity scheme, in so far as the United States was concerned, was conceived in sin and born in iniquity. It is a fraud and a sham, intended to bolster up the discredited Taft administration, and I sincerely trust that the Canadian people will not assist in carrying out this deal between the sensational newspapers and a corrupt political party.

Thus does Mr. Graham denounce reciprocity to the Canadians. He strives to generate a prejudice among them against the United States by maligning his adopted country and to excite in their minds a false alarm as to the ultimate purpose and intention of the United States with reference to annexation. Having been exposed and beaten at Washington, he turns now to serve his employers by trying to defeat reciprocity in Canada. Who is paying him to do this work in Canada? Certainly not the Grange; and if not the Grange, then who is footing the bills?

During our hearings it was shown that Allen & Graham had had numerous conferences with leading manufacturers opposed to reciprocity. Allen admitted conferences with Mr. Hastings, president of the Paper and Pulp Association; with Mr. Lyman, secretary and general manager of what is known as the Print Paper Trust; with Mr. Bronson, representing the Lumber Trust; with Mr. Wood, of the American Woolen Co.; and with others; and he admitted that he talked to those manufacturers about contributing to a fund to pay his firm for the work they were doing in opposition to reciprocity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Merely for a suggestion. If I remember accurately, no literature went out from the office on William Street opposing reciprocity on the ground that it would hurt the Paper Trust or on the ground that it would hurt the Sawmill Association or upon the ground that it would hurt the woolen manufacturers. All that went thence went in the name of the farmer, and all the protests made from their office were upon the ground that the farmer would be hurt while the manufacturer would be benefited.

Mr. STONE. I think that is so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And that, too, while they were receiving money or asking money from these very people who were engaging them and with whom they were holding conferences.

Mr. STONE. Yes; they admitted that they had already received money from at least one manufacturer.

Mr. President, all this is easy to understand. This New York firm was employed to "work up" the farmers and get delegations appointed to come to Washington and create the impression that the farmers would resist and resent this legislation, but behind the movement and footing the bills were numerous great protected industrial interests. Have these same interests put Allen & Graham at work in Canada with the hope of accomplishing there what they failed to accomplish in the United States? Graham was born in Canada and lived there the greater part of his life. It may be he thinks he can turn the trick up there he so signally failed to turn in this country. We will see. At all events Allen and Graham are very interesting characters, and I shall watch their efforts in Canada with great interest, whatever the outcome may be.

Mr. President, I feel too much fatigued to continue longer. I will here insert as an appendix to these remarks the testimony the Senate has given me leave to print. And now I close, after apologizing for consuming so much of the Senate's time.

APPENDIX.

(From the testimony of P. V. Collins, given before the Senate Finance Committee.)

Senator SIMMONS. The petition that we had read here yesterday from Michigan sets forth the idea that the signers would not vote for anybody in favor of this treaty.

Mr. COLLINS. Up to this time we have not gone that far, but I want to say they signed the petitions with their eyes open. On the back of every petition which went out was the full schedule. They knew what they were signing. These farmers said—

I will not read this whole petition, as it is too long. I will read the concluding clause of it, and to that I call the particular attention of my Democratic colleagues—

"The farmers have been the last to feel any direct benefit from protective tariffs. Why should the protective party expect the farmers to be the first to suffer the loss of that protective tariff policy?

"We, the undersigned farmers, therefore earnestly appeal to our Senators and Representatives in Congress to defend the agricultural interests of the Northwest against this unfair and misnamed species of reciprocity, at least until the same principle of free trade can be applied to what the American farmers have to buy that is now proposed on what American farmers have to sell."

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. This petition that you have exhibited there, you say contains the names of 35,000 farmers?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Thirty thousand of them, I understood you to say, live in Minnesota?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Where do the other 5,000 live?

Mr. COLLINS. The other 5,000 live in the adjoining States, mostly in the Dakotas.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Did you prepare this petition?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. And circulated it?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. You say there are 150,000 farmers in the State of Minnesota?

Mr. COLLINS. One hundred and fifty-five thousand farms, not farmers. Of course each represents, perhaps, a farmer.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Was this petition signed by any person other than a farmer?

Mr. COLLINS. Not that I know of. Of course it would be impossible to check up and absolutely know that each individual is a farmer.

Senator STONE. Were the petitions circulated in the towns and cities?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

Senator STONE. Wholly on the farms?

Mr. COLLINS. Wholly on the farms. We published them in the paper. The paper does not circulate in the towns and cities. We also sent them to the secretaries of all of the farmers' organizations, so that they might circulate them among their members.

Senator STONE. Circulated through the State of Minnesota and in adjoining States?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Senator STONE. But in Minnesota you got 30,000 farmers out of 150,000?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; out of 155,000.

Senator STONE. You got about 20 per cent of the farmers in Minnesota to sign that petition?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir; I did. We think that is remarkably significant for seeding time. Remember, the farmers are scattered over a wide expanse of territory.

Senator STONE. Of course, they are not all in a bunch.

Mr. COLLINS. That does not mean that the other 80 per cent refused by any means. It means that every farmer to whom that petition was offered signed it, with the exception of 20 or 30 altogether.

Senator GALLINGER. On that point, so that I may be sure of your position. You sent these to your subscribers more particularly?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Senator GALLINGER. You did not send them broadcast to all the farmers?

Mr. COLLINS. Only to secretaries of the farmers' organizations that we could reach.

Senator STONE. I understood that your paper reached one out of every three of the farmers in Minnesota?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Senator STONE. In other words, one-third of the farmers in Minnesota are readers of your paper?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. They have been protesting very earnestly in your paper against this reciprocity agreement, and yet, under your guidance and direction, you are able to get only one-fifth?

Mr. COLLINS. Practically one-half of our subscribers.

Senator STONE. Able to get only one-fifth of the farmers of the State to sign that petition?

Mr. COLLINS. One-sixth—between one-fifth and one-sixth.

Senator STONE. Between one-fifth and one-sixth, although you have been weekly appealing to one-third of them to sign it.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; but if the Senator had ever dealt with the mass of farmers he would realize, perhaps, more than we do how apathetic are the farmers, how slow they are to respond, how slow they are to grasp any crisis. They will come along next fall; they will sign that petition next fall and send the rest of them in. They are coming in every day.

Senator STONE. How many Minnesota farmers came down with this delegation?

Mr. COLLINS. Nine.

Mr. FEIG. We are all farmers. Every man on our delegation is a farmer. I, as chairman, happen to occupy an official position. I went from my farm into that office. I have held it for nine years, and if I quit to-day or to-morrow I am going back to the farm. I am a farmer in every sense of the word.

Senator STONE. I am not imputing that you are not a farmer.

Mr. FEIG. Every man on our delegation here is a farmer.

Senator STONE. Well, I understood that Mr. Collins was the editor of a newspaper.

Mr. FEIG. He also runs three farms. Does not that make him a farmer?

Senator STONE. I desire to address myself to Mr. Collins, if he will give me his attention. I understood that you were the editor of an agricultural newspaper in Minnesota?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. And you are managing a farm?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Well, you are then what Mr. Bryan calls himself—an "editor and agriculturist" rather than a farmer.

Mr. COLLINS. An agriculturist is a man who conducts his farm with brains and a farmer is usually a tenant, according to Webster's Dictionary.

Senator STONE. Are you one of the nine delegates?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Are there some bankers in your delegation?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

Senator STONE. None?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

Senator STONE. Is Mr. Meaghen a member of the committee?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir; let him speak for himself.

Senator STONE. Is he a bank president?

Mr. COLLINS. He is a bank president.

Mr. MEAGHEN. I will have my inning on that question a little later. I am a bank president.

Senator STONE. Mr. Feig is chairman, and he is a State official. Is that a fact?

Mr. COLLINS. He is directly connected with agricultural administration—inspection of grain elevators.

Senator STONE. J. R. Moreley and W. J. Shilling, are they members of your delegation?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Moreley is; Mr. Shilling is not here.

Senator STONE. Is he also a State official?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

Senator STONE. He is not connected officially with the dairy department of Minnesota?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir; he is the president of the Creamery Association, an association of farmers, and a leading dairyman of the State.

Senator STONE. Is Mr. R. A. Wilkinson, of Lake Elmo, a member of the delegation?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir; does he not look like a farmer?

Senator STONE. Is he not a lawyer?

Mr. COLLINS. He used to be counsel for the Great Northern Railroad. He is a real farmer.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Mr. Collins, I understood you to say that the farmers of Minnesota were very enthusiastic in opposition to this reciprocity agreement.

Mr. COLLINS. More than that; they are vehement.

Senator STONE. I did not understand you.

Mr. COLLINS. They are more than that. They are vehement in opposition—they are bitter.

Senator STONE. And practically unanimous?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Enthusiastic, vehement, and unanimous.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Enthusiastic, vehement, and unanimous?

Mr. COLLINS. And bitter.

Senator STONE. And bitter. I have here before me a sheet taken from the Northwestern Agriculturist of May 6, 1911. The Northwestern Agriculturist is the paper you publish?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. On this sheet I find a rather interesting statement showing the responses that were made on an appeal sent out by you for contributions to pay the expenses of this delegation down to Washington to protest against this reciprocity agreement. It appears from this statement that the total amount you were able to collect up to May 6 was $389.25, and that you paid out $98.10 for collecting that.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Leaving a net collection of $291.15.

Mr. COLLINS. We divided the boodle last night, gentlemen, and each of us received $50 out of the funds that had been collected so far; that $98 had not yet borne fruit. It takes a little time for fruit to ripen, especially on farms. The funds will come in. We have faith in the farmers behind us; but if they do not, we will pay our own bills.

Senator STONE. It seems that $111 was contributed by bankers.

Mr. COLLINS. Bankers, country banks owned by farmers.

Senator STONE. Ninety-seven dollars and twenty-five cents was contributed by creameries, $41.25 by elevators, and $50 by a fire-insurance company.

Mr. COLLINS. That is a farmers' fire-insurance company—the Farmers' Cooperative Fire Insurance Co.

Senator STONE. Ninety-eight dollars by individuals, running from $5 down to 25 cents each; $5 by a market company, and the remainder by Societies of Equity.

Now, the point I desire to call your attention to is that if the farmers of Minnesota contributed practically nothing to this $389 fund the response from the farmers was not very liberal to send a delegation down here to protest against the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. COLLINS. That is an unfair statement.

Senator STONE. Neither enthusiastic, vehement, unanimous, nor bitter.

Mr. COLLINS. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that all of that came from farmers. The farmers are the bankers; the farmers are behind the Cooperative Fire Insurance Co.; the farmers are the men that run the creameries.

Senator STONE. These 30,000 men out of 155,000 farmers who signed this petition were willing to take their lead pencils and attach their names to a petition, but were not willing to contribute to pay the expenses of your delegation.

Mr. COLLINS. They will be equally willing to put their cross on the ballot.

Senator STONE. It would seem to me, I submit to you, Mr. Collins, that if the farmers of Minnesota were so unanimously and vehemently opposed to this agreement they would have contributed something toward paying the expenses of a delegation which they had appointed, according to this newspaper of yours, to send down here to represent them in opposing this agreement before the Senate Finance Committee.

Mr. COLLINS. There is not any question, Senator, but that every penny I have paid out will be reimbursed by the farmers by a voluntary subscription. They are slow, but they are reliable, and this very situation, gentlemen, answers the report that was conveyed to me from the editor of the American Economist.

Senator STONE. It is a kind of slow enthusiasm. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLLINS. The report was circulated here in Washington that P. V. Collins is being backed by the robber barons, whoever they are. Those are the robber barons.

Senator BAILEY. I want to ask you if it is a fair way to measure the enthusiasm of farmers by the size of their contributions?

Mr. COLLINS. It is absolutely ridiculous.

Senator STONE. You say that it is absolutely ridiculous, and yet you, as the spokesman and head of this movement, prepared and sent out petitions to the farmers to sign and to make contributions to pay these expenses, and urged them to do so in your newspaper?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. And yet you say you were urging them to do a ridiculous thing?

Mr. COLLINS. No; the fact that they have not done it by return mail—they will get there, but they come by slow freight. They do not come by telegraph.

Senator STONE. I am now referring to your answer to the question of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COLLINS. I say it is ridiculous to expect them to come by return mail. We know too much through getting subscriptions from farmers; time is no object to the farmer.

Senator STONE. Now, I wish to ask you this question: Do the farmers of Minnesota oppose the reciprocity agreement for the fear that it would reduce the price of farm labor in that State?

Mr. COLLINS. Indirectly it will, by closing the mills all over the country. You will see farmers and laborers hungry for their jobs. Labor will be reduced, and the effect of this will be felt on the mills before it will be on the farmers.

Senator STONE. I would like to ask you, Mr. Collins, if it is not a fact that farm labor in Saskatchewan, and I will say in Manitoba, where it is lower than it is in Saskatchewan; that in Manitoba farm labor is higher than it is in Minnesota to-day?

Mr. MEAGHEN. Not higher.

Senator STONE. Higher, I say.

Mr. MEAGHEN. I say not.

Senator STONE. I am asking Mr. Collins, not you. Let us have one at a time.

Mr. COLLINS. I have no personal knowledge, but it was testified here yesterday by a Saskatchewan farmer that it was not. That is, as far as I know——

At this point I call attention to Senator MCCUMBER's admission made here to-day that farm labor was as high or higher in the northwestern Provinces of Canada than in the Northwestern States.

Senator STONE. I find it reported by the Tariff Board, which report I have here before me, that the average monthly wage in Manitoba is higher than that in Minnesota, and the monthly wage in Saskatchewan still higher than that in Manitoba, and the exact figures are given in the tariff report.

Mr. COLLINS. Is it 50 per cent higher, Senator?

Senator STONE. No, sir.

Mr. COLLINS. But the yield of the acres there is 50 per cent greater than it is in the United States.

Senator STONE. I am talking now about labor, not about yield.

Mr. COLLINS. How many months in the year is it higher?

Senator STONE. For the whole farming season; 8 months.

Mr. MEAGHEN. There is no whole year up north. They only pay for 6 months, and we pay them for the 12 months in Minnesota.

Senator STONE. At page 86, I am referring to now; and I will call the attention of Mr. Collins, if I can have his attention—I want to call his attention to this statement that in 1910 the wage per month on season hiring—running from 7 to 8 months, beginning April 1—in Minnesota was $30 to $35, and in Saskatchewan $35.

Mr. COLLINS. But in Minnesota during the harvest time the harvest hands are paid $2 and $3 a day. In Saskatchewan they are not.

Senator STONE. I have it by the hands also; take it by the hands, the individual. Take spike pitchers, in Manitoba they receive $2.50 to $2.75 a day and in Saskatchewan $3 and in North Dakota $3. Field pitchers, in Manitoba $3 a day, Saskatchewan $3 a day, and in Minnesota $2.50.

Separator men in Saskatchewan $5 to $7; Minnesota is not given there, but North Dakota is $5 to $6, and so on down the line. Now, if those figures are correct, I would like to ask what the danger is to the farm laborer as a result of this reciprocity agreement?

Mr. COLLINS. The danger to the American farm laborer?

Senator STONE. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. By the closing of the American mills. He will have millions more competitors after his job.

Senator STONE. The closing of the American flouring mills?

Mr. COLLINS. I mean factories all over the country, which means panic.

Senator WILLIAMS. Do you think the reciprocity bill will close the factories?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir. If I had time I could prove it.

Senator STONE. Do you mean woolen mills, cotton mills, and steel factories?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir. If you look at the bank clearings to-day you will find we are already in a state of panic by reason of this reciprocity. The mills are to-day on the verge of closing down.

Senator WILLIAMS. I thought their complaint was that the Canadian reciprocity discriminated against the American farmer in favor of the manufacturer, and now you state that the American manufacturer is going to close his mills.

Mr. COLLINS. He is going to cut off his own head.

(From the testimony of N. J. Bachelder.)

Senator STONE. How long has the firm of Allen & Graham been in the employ of the National Grange?

Mr. BACHELDER. Since about the time I became master, in 1905.

Senator STONE. Had they served the grange in any capacity under Mr. Aaron Jones's administration?

Mr. BACHELDER. I am not sure about that; I am not positive about that.

Senator STONE. Are they members of the grange?

Mr. BACHELDER. They are not.

Senator STONE. How long had you known these gentlemen before you employed them?

Mr. BACHELDER. Why, perhaps a couple of years.

Senator STONE. How did you become acquainted with them?

Mr. BACHELDER. I became acquainted with them through the efforts to pass the bill providing for denatured alcohol.

Senator STONE. Were they interested otherwise than for the grange in the denatured alcohol bill?

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not know, but I presume they were.

Senator STONE. Did you pay them for that service?

Mr. BACHELDER. Am I required to go into the details in regard to that?

Senator STONE. You are not under oath, Governor, and you can exercise your own judgment and privileges as to whether you answer.

Mr. BACHELDER. I will say that we did not pay them.

Senator STONE. Do you know who did pay them?

Mr. BACHELDER. No; I do not.

Senator STONE. Have you had any information as to who were cooperating with you through Allen & Graham?

Mr. BACHELDER. I have not.

Senator STONE. Have you been informed that they received a large fee from other large interests in connection with that bill——

Mr. BACHELDER. I never have.

Senator STONE. For work on that bill?

Mr. BACHELDER. I never had any information upon that subject.

Senator STONE. What was the next matter about which you conferred with them and upon which you employed them?

Mr. BACHELDER. I think the next matter was the good roads proposition.

Senator STONE. Was legislation pending here in Washington to promote good roads, and was that the matter about which you engaged them?

Mr. BACHELDER. That was the matter.

Senator STONE. Did you pay them for the service they rendered you here in Washington in promoting that enterprise?

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not think I will answer that question, unless I am obliged to.

Senator STONE. You are not obliged to, at least I shall not insist upon it. Do you know whether other interests paid them large fees for their services in this——

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not.

Senator STONE. The automobile interest?

Mr. BACHELDER. I think they paid them something.

Senator STONE. Who paid them something? The manufacturers of automobiles?

Mr. BACHELDER. I think the manufacturers of automobiles. The campaign was carried along in the name of the grange. It was the grange campaign, and the grange accepted the funds to help meet the expenses wherever they came legitimately.

Senator STONE. In other words, the grange was used as a shield for the manufacturers who were prosecuting this enterprise?

Mr. BACHELDER. No. On the contrary, the manufacturers helped finance the grange campaign for good roads.

Senator STONE. That is another way of stating it. Did you make a contract with the automobile manufacturers for compensating Allen & Graham, or did Allen & Graham make their own financial arrangements?

Mr. BACHELDER. They made the arrangement, if any was made.

Senator STONE. Did the manufacturers of automobiles pay anything to your treasury to be paid to Allen & Graham?

Mr. BACHELDER. No, sir.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Do you not know that Allen & Graham are not attorneys at law?

Mr. BACHELDER. No; I do not know it.

Senator STONE. Have you been laboring under the impression that they are?

Mr. BACHELDER. I supposed they were.

Senator STONE. Have you been to their offices to confer with them?

Mr. BACHELDER. I have.

Senator STONE. On legal matters?

Mr. BACHELDER. On matters pertaining to legislation.

Senator STONE. Did you ever see anything on their doors in the way of a sign, or on the heading of their letters to you, or anything else, indicating that they were pretending to practice law?

Mr. BACHELDER. I think there is nothing on the letterhead but their name, "Allen & Graham," and their address.

Senator STONE. You spoke of several other things in the paper you read in which you had them employed other than the two to which I have referred?

Mr. BACHELDER. Yes.

Senator STONE. Did you pay them for any service on those other things?

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not think I will answer.

Senator STONE. Have you ever paid Allen & Graham on behalf of the National Grange a penny?

Mr. BACHELDER. We have agreed to pay them for the work on the reciprocity bill.

Senator STONE. When was that agreement made?

Mr. BACHELDER. When we first met in New York—the legislative and the executive committees.

Senator STONE. And that is the only agreement you ever made to pay them anything?

Mr. BACHELDER. I am speaking of this agreement. We have agreed to pay them in this matter. They are in our employ.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. How much are you to pay them?

Mr. BACHELDER. The amount is not agreed upon. We do not know how long it will take.

Senator STONE. You have simply agreed to pay them?

Mr. BACHELDER. We have simply agreed to pay them their price.

Senator STONE. Whatever they charge. You exhibited some papers which you said had been circulated in opposition to this reciprocity agreement?

Mr. BACHELDER. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Who prepared these papers?

Mr. BACHELDER. The legislative and executive committees, with the assistance of Allen & Graham.

Senator STONE. With the assistance of Allen & Graham. Well, did not Allen & Graham prepare them with the assistance of the legislative committee?

Mr. BACHELDER. No, sir.

Senator STONE. Who prepared them in the first instance?

Mr. BACHELDER. Well, some of them the legislative committee prepared in the first instance and some Allen & Graham; they were always submitted to the legislative committee and revised. They went out under the responsibility of the National Grange, over their signatures. Allen & Graham assisted in the preparation.

Senator STONE. When Allen & Graham prepared a document, did they send it to you?

Mr. BACHELDER. Yes.

Senator STONE. Sent it to you in New Hampshire?

Mr. BACHELDER. Yes.

Senator STONE. And you passed on it?

Mr. BACHELDER. I passed on it or revised it; and if it was of enough importance to submit to the members of the legislative committee I sent it around to them frequently and got their signatures on it.

Senator STONE. Now, after you had approved it, or after the legislative committee had approved it, what was done with it?

Mr. BACHELDER. It was printed and mailed.

Senator STONE. Who printed it?

Mr. BACHELDER. I think it was printed in New York.

Senator STONE. Who had it printed?

Mr. BACHELDER. Allen & Graham.

Senator STONE. What legal matters did you ever consult Allen & Graham about?

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not recall that I ever did. It was in relation to legislative matters that we employed them.

Senator STONE. Promoting or preventing legislation?

Mr. BACHELDER. Promoting or preventing legislation that the National Grange stood for or against.

Senator STONE. Governor, you consulted them about aiding you in promoting or preventing legislation?

Mr. BACHELDER. Absolutely.

Senator STONE. What did you consult them about—the best way of proceeding?

Mr. BACHELDER. The best way of securing the passage of the bill or defeating it.

Senator STONE. You considered they were experts in that particular line?

Mr. BACHELDER. I considered they were skillful along that line.

Senator STONE. Then you were hunting men who knew how to manipulate legislative bodies?

Mr. BACHELDER. We hunted for men who knew how to do the things that we wanted done.

Senator STONE. So you, as I understand it, Gov. Bachelder, were employing two men who you considered experts in securing the passage of legislation or preventing its passage; in other words, men who are generally called "lobbyists"?

Mr. BACHELDER. No.

Senator STONE. In other words, men who are generally termed "lobbyists," and who, at the same time, were in the employ and receiving compensation from other large interests; and you permitted them to use the National Grange to accomplish things that the other interests were as much concerned in as you were?

Mr. BACHELDER. We did not ask them what other interests they were working for, providing they did the work we wanted done in the way that we thought it should be done, to prevent the passage of this reciprocity matter.

Senator STONE. And you were lending the assistance of the grange to prevent or to secure the passage of legislation in which other large interests were concerned, and for which other large interests were paying and footing the bills?

Mr. BACHELDER. No; we were not lending assistance to them; we were borrowing their assistance.

Senator STONE. Put it that way, if you desire. Were Allen & Graham, or either of them, at the last meeting of the National Grange?

Mr. BACHELDER. I think they were.

Senator STONE. And at previous meetings?

Mr. BACHELDER. Why, I can not remember about that.

Senator STONE. Well, try to remember.

Mr. BACHELDER. I think they were at some sessions previous to the last.

Senator STONE. What were they there for, not being members of the grange?

Mr. BACHELDER. They were there to assist us in advising in legislative matters; they were our legislative advisers.

Senator STONE. What legislative matter was pending at the meeting of 1909?

Mr. BACHELDER. Why, the "parcels post," the "antioleomargarine law." The "good roads" was very prominent at that time and the election of Senators by the people.

Senator STONE. Were Allen & Graham employed by the National Grange to promote that legislation?

Mr. BACHELDER. They were not.

Senator STONE. If they were not employed to do it, what were they at that meeting in 1909 for?

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not know if I can give any specific reason, except to advise us as we needed advice on legislative matters.

Senator STONE. Have Allen & Graham done any work for the grange in promoting legislation for the popular elections of Senators?

Mr. BACHELDER. I do not recall that they have. The National Grange has.

Senator STONE. And you never paid them a cent for all their services?

Mr. BACHELDER. I did not testify about that. I said we did not pay for anything in the denatured-alcohol matter.

Senator STONE. Have you paid anything for services up to date?

Mr. BACHELDER. We expect to.

Senator STONE. On the reciprocity bill?

Mr. BACHELDER. On the reciprocity bill.

Senator STONE. But outside of and before the reciprocity bill, for all these services, running through several years, have you ever paid them a cent?

Mr. BACHELDER. I said I thought I would not answer that question.

Senator MCCUMBER. You declined to answer some questions as to what fees you had paid for services. Did you consider the question of what fees you may have paid for services not to have any bearing on this subject?

Mr. BACHELDER. That is the reason I did not answer them.

Senator MCCUMBER. You did not desire to go into private affairs that had no connection with this?

Mr. BACHELDER. That is just it.

Senator STONE. The question I asked was whether he had paid anything, even a penny, and he declined to answer.

Senator MCCUMBER. Would you have answered if your answer would have elucidated this question in any manner?

Senator KERN. That would be a matter of opinion.

Senator MCCUMBER. It is a matter of opinion for him to exercise.

Mr. BACHELDER. I stated plainly and emphatically that Messrs. Graham and Allen were in our employ and were detailed for work on this account.

(From the testimony of Whidden Graham.)

Senator STONE. What is your name?

Mr. GRAHAM. Whidden Graham.

Senator STONE. A member of the firm of Allen & Graham?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am.

Senator STONE. Where are your offices?

Mr. GRAHAM. 11 William Street, New York City.

Senator STONE. Where is William Street; what part of New York?

Mr. GRAHAM. It is quite close to the New York Stock Exchange, which has petitioned for reciprocity.

Senator STONE. How near is it to Wall Street?

Mr. GRAHAM. I should say about 100 feet.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Are you a lawyer?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not, have never pretended to be, and have never held myself out to be. We were employed as writers on legislative matters. * * *

Senator STONE. Is Mr. Allen a lawyer?

Mr. GRAHAM. He is not, has never pretended to be, and has never held himself out to be.

Senator STONE. In addition to writing articles to promote or develop legislation, you often give publicity to the propaganda?

Mr. GRAHAM. We do not, except very incidentally. As a matter of fact in certain cases the only publicity was through the letters and petitions sent out, because the newspapers have been inspired by the Associated Press or the Newspaper Publishers' Association, and I will furnish proof of that, not to give any space to the side of antireciprocity, and to pull for reciprocity strong. That proof will be filed with the committee. We prepare arguments and briefs.

Senator STONE. I will ask you if in your clientele you have had the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. GRAHAM. We have not.

Senator STONE. Never?

Mr. GRAHAM. Never, in any capacity. In this connection my partner was formerly engaged years ago in the business of customs-drawback broker, which means the collection of drawbacks. He was formerly engaged in the customs-drawback business collecting drawbacks on tin plates imported, and represented the Standard Oil Co. in the collection of drawbacks.

Senator STONE. Your partner represented them?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. You represent the American Cotton Oil Co.?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not. My partner did long ago.

Senator GALLINGER. In the matter of drawbacks?

Mr. GRAHAM. In the matter of drawbacks; not in connection with any legislation or any legislative or publicity matters.

Senator STONE. Were you paid anything for the good-roads service you rendered?

Mr. GRAHAM. By whom?

Senator STONE. Anybody.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes. I was asked to come to Washington, and I did come.

Senator STONE. Did either of you come to Washington when that denatured-alcohol bill was pending?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Allen came; I did not. In connection with the rebate on domestic alcohol, a different subject, the Senator from Mississippi was at that time a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I appeared before that committee. That was the only time that I went before the committee.

Senator STONE. Did you receive any compensation for your services in connection with the denatured-alcohol legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. We certainly did. Let me explain there what Gov. Bachelder did not. We received that compensation from a committee of manufacturers of all kinds using alcohol. There was a committee formed, and they employed us and paid us to write these articles.

Senator STONE. Did the grange pay you anything for it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Absolutely not a cent.

Senator STONE. You were carrying the work on in the name of the grange?

Mr. GRAHAM. We were not. We were carrying it on the name of the committee of manufacturers. The grange was merely giving assistance.

Senator STONE. Did you receive any compensation for your services in the oleomargarine legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not. It was simply a matter of writing one letter. Mr. Bachelder said he was coming down to Washington to appear, and asked me if I would draft a letter for him to send out to the members of the grange. I did that.

Senator STONE. Did you receive compensation for your services in the good-roads campaign?

Mr. GRAHAM. We did.

Senator STONE. From whom?

Mr. GRAHAM. From manufacturers of automobiles and carriages and other people interested in good roads.

Senator STONE. You carried on that campaign in the name of the grange?

Mr. GRAHAM. We did not, entirely. It was carried on in the name of different organizations—various interests. They sent out literature.

Senator STONE. Gov. Bachelder was mistaken, then, in what he said about it?

Mr. GRAHAM. He did not say it was the National Grange entirely.

Senator STONE. Have you brought with you lists of all the papers which you prepared or your firm prepared?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have. They are exactly the same papers as those produced here by Gov. Bachelder.

Senator STONE. Did you prepare those which Gov. Bachelder handed in?

Mr. GRAHAM. We assisted in their preparation. One is a statement by Aaron Jones before the Committee on Ways and Means——

Senator STONE. Did you prepare the statement that Aaron Jones made to the committee?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Jones and I were at the Manhattan Hotel, along with Mr. Atkeson; Gov. Bachelder; Mr. Godfrey, of New York; Mr. Raine, of Missouri; and Mr. Messick, of Delaware. We talked over this matter and drafted a resolution to be adopted by the grange. We drafted the resolutions and took them upstairs. They said, "That will not do; that is not right; you want to make it stronger. Put it right up to them good and strong." They talked it over that way and we gradually evolved these resolutions.

Senator STONE. Then you either drafted or aided in the preparation of the papers?

Mr. GRAHAM. Practically all these.

Senator STONE. You prepared most of them, did you not?

Mr. GRAHAM. I should say that we personally assisted in preparing most of them.

And here is some of this literature:

FARMERS PROTEST AGAINST CANADIAN RECIPROCITY BILL—NATIONAL GRANGE REPRESENTATIVE SHOWS THAT IT PROVIDES FOR FREE TRADE IN FARM PRODUCTS AND HIGH TARIFF FOR ALL MANUFACTURED ARTICLES THE FARMER BUYS.

(Address by Aaron Jones, master Indiana State Grange, and member of National Grange legislative committee, before Committee on Ways and Means, February 9, 1911.)

I appear on behalf of the National Grange, the principal farm organization of the country, with local branches in 30 States, to record our emphatic protest against the proposed reciprocity arrangement with Canada. I have been a working farmer all my life; have been actively identified with the Grange or Patrons of Husbandry for more than 20 years, and was for 8 years master of the National Grange. I have gone among the farmers in every State of the Union, and have met thousands of them at various State and National Grange meetings. I am thoroughly familiar with their views on this and other public questions, and I am here to declare that the farmers of the country are unalterably opposed to the reciprocity bill which you are now considering, and that they believe it would inflict a serious and permanent injury to their industry.

The principle on which the protective policy has been defended during the past 20 years is that all classes and interests of the country should receive equal protection against the competition of foreign products. It was to carry out this principle that the duties on farm products were imposed by the McKinley law, and reimposed by the Dingley and Payne Tariff Acts. Had it not been for the tariff on farm products the protective system would long ago have been abolished.

And here is some more of it—a table of statistics:

	Canadian tariff.	United States tariff.
Tableware	15 per cent.	60 per cent.
Tin plate	Free.	45 per cent.
Tinware	15 per cent.	Do.
Wire, some kinds free, none over	10 per cent.	75 cents per 100 pounds.
Hats	20 per cent.	55 per cent.
Sugar	35 per cent.	80 per cent.
Carpets	25 per cent.	60 per cent.
Oilcloth	do.	45 per cent.
Furniture	20 per cent.	35 per cent.
Cotton cloth	25 per cent.	50 to 60 per cent.
Gloves and mitts	22½ per cent.	60 per cent.

Books	do.	25 per cent.
Lead	10 per cent.	80 per cent.
Clocks and watches	20 per cent.	40 to 60 per cent.
Bicycles	do.	45 per cent.

Senator WILLIAMS. You say you are not a lobbyist?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not.

Senator WILLIAMS. And yet you received fees to promote the enactment or the defeat of legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. To write articles about them. Is the newspaper man a lobbyist who is paid a salary of $40 or $50 a week to write editorials?

Senator WILLIAMS. I do not want to go into that dissertation with you. I am simply asking you a question.

Mr. GRAHAM. And I answer, I am not.

Senator WILLIAMS. But you did receive fees?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator WILLIAMS. Upon an agreement to promote the enactment of or to promote the defeat of legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. We do not.

Senator WILLIAMS. And you are not attorneys?

Mr. GRAHAM. No. We do not receive fees for that purpose. I am paid for writing articles. I was not a lobbyist when I wrote for the national Democratic committee and was paid a salary to do it.

Senator WILLIAMS. But you did receive fees?

Mr. GRAHAM. Payment for writing articles.

Senator WILLIAMS. For writing articles, preparing briefs, and preparing material for the purpose of securing the enactment, or securing the defeat of legislation, and you did not receive those fees as a legal adviser, because you are not a lawyer.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not a lawyer, and I have never pretended to be. The editor of a newspaper who is paid $50 a week to write editorials in a paper on which he is employed may influence legislation, but he is not a lobbyist for that reason.

* * * * * * *

Senator CLARK. You stated in answer to the Senator from Missouri that you received a fee for advocating or opposing legislation by the articles which you wrote.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator CLARK. Is that fee contingent upon the success or the failure of the legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir; not at all—not in any sense of the word.

Senator STONE. When is it to be paid?

Mr. GRAHAM. When the work is wound up. We can not tell how long it will last. We thought it would only last a month, that everything was greased, and it was going to be slipped through the House and Senate and everything was to be all right, but there were a few farmers who woke up to the situation.

Senator STONE. And you helped wake them up?

Mr. GRAHAM. I did; and I also wake some other people once in a while.

Senator STONE. That is what you are paid to do?

Mr. GRAHAM. Exactly; and I did it well.

Senator STONE. How were you paid by the manufacturers of automobiles?

Mr. GRAHAM. They contributed to a general fund, as do the carriage builders, manufacturers of road-making material, and all sorts of people interested in good roads—automobilists and individuals.

Senator STONE. How much did they contribute?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not care to go into the private details of this matter, and unless the chairman insists I shall not do so. I do not think it has any bearing on reciprocity.

Senator STONE. Did they contribute to pay the expenses, such as postage, printing, etc., as well as to pay your fee?

Mr. GRAHAM. They did.

Senator STONE. Did you handle the funds?

Mr. GRAHAM. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, whether or not I have to go into the details of these matters with which I have been connected—the financial details.

Senator STONE. I have not asked you for the financial details. I asked you whether you handled the funds.

Mr. GRAHAM. Whether we handle the funds? I do not. They are handled by the treasurer in Detroit.

Senator STONE. Did you have any control over that fund, or any part of it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not at all. It was paid to us.

Senator STONE. Was any part of it paid out on your order?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; it was paid to us. There was a central good-roads committee composed of several gentlemen of Detroit—the Packard and other manufacturers and manufacturers of accessories—and the money was put in by various people who thought they were interested, and they paid——

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. While we are talking about the people you represent I will ask you if you ever represented the Distillers' Security Co.?

Mr. GRAHAM. We do not, Senator Stone, never. The contributions were made to the committee of manufacturers by the distillers. They contributed a large amount to get the denatured-alcohol law passed, and they stated that they have contributed because of the increase in their business. They contributed in their proportion; also the hat manufacturers of Danbury and the furniture manufacturers of Grand Rapids. They wanted this legislation.

Senator STONE. Then the Distillers' Security Co., or those who belonged to it, did contribute?

Mr. GRAHAM. They contributed to the fund of this committee of manufacturers; they did that.

Senator STONE. How do you know it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Because the committee of manufacturers kept a record of all that was paid.

Senator STONE. Did you see it?

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not see the money, but I presume they did. I did not see the checks. The Senator has asked me the question whether we were employed by the Distillers' Security Co. We were not. The Distillers' Security Co. contributed to the fund that was raised for the purpose of paying the legitimate expenses of printing and postage and other expenses.

Senator STONE. I am asking how you know that the Distillers' Security Co., known as the Whisky Trust, contributed. How do you know it?

Mr. GRAHAM. From the committee of manufacturers. Mr. Allen was the Secretary of that committee——

Senator STONE. You mean your partner?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Allen was secretary of the committee of manufacturers which had entire charge of the work of securing the passage of the denatured-alcohol law.

Senator STONE. Was Mr. Allen a manufacturer?

Mr. GRAHAM. He was not. He was secretary of the committee of manufacturers.

Senator STONE. And representing them in that legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM. In the same way that he is employed by the grange now.

Senator STONE. Did you ever represent the International Harvester Co. in any way?

Mr. GRAHAM. Never, except that Mr. Allen's former firm, which was engaged in the collection of drawbacks, they collected——

Senator STONE. For the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. GRAHAM. To collect drawbacks. This was 10 or 12 years ago, and I do not see why I should have to go into ancient history about customhouse brokers' fees, and anything of that kind. However, if the committee thinks it is material, I am perfectly willing to waste your time in answering these questions.

Senator STONE. You represented a good many large enterprises on drawbacks, and in other ways, did you not?

Mr. GRAHAM. My partner's firm did formerly. He is not in that business now and has not been for 10 years.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Do you object to stating the fee that you received for the denatured-alcohol matter?

Mr. GRAHAM. I decidedly do. I am not brought here to tell my private business for the last 10 years. I do not see what bearing it has on the question of reciprocity.

Senator STONE. If you object I shall not press the question.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do object most decidedly.

Senator STONE. A pretty large fee, was it not?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; but I am not inquiring about other large fees that have been paid to other gentlemen.

* * * * * * *

Senator WILLIAMS. You have confessed, have you not——

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not confessed to anything, because I am not here to confess.

Senator WILLIAMS. Then you have admitted, or you have stated, or have enunciated—you can use your own language—that you have received payment for preparing articles, letters, briefs, etc., to promote the success of or to defeat legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Senator WILLIAMS. Now, then, I want to ask you another question. What is your other business, or have you any other business?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have no other business employment except as a writer. I am a writer on economic, financial, and commercial questions of any kind.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Have you been in conference with representatives of other industries opposed to this reciprocity agreement?

Mr. GRAHAM. What does the Senator mean by representatives of other industries?

Senator STONE. I mean just what I say. You know whether you have been in conference with men who represent other interests?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not.

Senator STONE. Have you had any correspondence with them?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not. I met yesterday a gentleman for the first time at the hotel—I was introduced to him for the first time—who represents another industry; I never met him before. He was brought up and introduced to me by a friend.

Senator STONE. Have you had any conference or correspondence with representatives of news-paper manufacturers?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have had no correspondence with them.

Senator STONE. You have administered rather severely on the newspapers.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Now, I will ask you about the men who make paper. Have you had any conferences with them?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have not.

Senator STONE. Has your partner?

Mr. GRAHAM. My partner is present, and will testify about that.

Senator STONE. Do you know whether he has?

Mr. GRAHAM. My partner is here, and can testify to anything in regard to what has been promised by any other outside interest, so called. We are employed by the National Grange, and paid at a rate that is satisfactory to ourselves, and if any outside interest chooses to appreciate our services by paying us, we are entitled to such payment, and I do not think it is a matter for this honorable body to inquire into, and I shall decline to answer any further questions on that line.

Senator STONE. Are you accepting payment from outside interests?

Mr. GRAHAM. I decline to answer that question, as to what I expect or what I might get.

Senator STONE. Have you or your firm any arrangement with other interests for pay or for compensation for these services against reciprocity?

Mr. GRAHAM. I decline to answer that question.

Senator STONE. You decline to answer?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do.

Senator STONE. Why?

Mr. GRAHAM. Because I do not think that is a matter pertinent to the investigation by this honorable committee. That is a matter, however, for your committee to decide.

Senator STONE. You are representing the grange?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not representing the grange.

Senator STONE. I asked you a while ago if you were also representing some other interests, and you said no.

Mr. GRAHAM. We are not.

Senator STONE. If you are accepting compensation, you are representing them.

Mr. GRAHAM. We are employees of the grange. We are not representing them.

Senator STONE. Do you expect to receive compensation from other interests to fight this legislation if you do not intend to render them any service?

Mr. GRAHAM. I decline to answer that.

Senator STONE. How many interests are you accepting pay from outside of the grange?

Mr. GRAHAM. I make the same answer.

Senator STONE. You decline to answer?

Mr. GRAHAM. I decline to answer.

Senator STONE. Are you acquainted with Mr. Chester W. Lyman?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am not; I do not know him; I never saw him.

Senator STONE. Do you know whether Mr. Allen has had any conference with him?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is a matter with regard to which I will give the same answer. I decline to answer. You are inquiring into our private business.

Senator STONE. He is secretary and assistant to the president of the International Paper Co., is he not?

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know. I know that I do not remember ever having seen him, and I do not know him, and I have had no correspondence with him.

Senator STONE. Have you conferred or talked with your partner about any conference that he has had with Mr. Lyman?

Mr. GRAHAM. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, whether I have to answer these questions as to my private business?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Graham, you need not answer any questions about your private business unless you desire to do so. You can use your own judgment. The committee have entered on the subject, and might as well conclude it as briefly as possible.

Mr. GRAHAM. As I understood the very kind words of the Senator from Texas, who has expressed the view that there has been nothing improper in the action of the grange, I want to say here that the action of the National Grange has been backed up and indorsed by every individual member in the remotest corner of Maine, Oregon, or Washington, and that if any reflection is to be cast on the National Grange because we may have been promised compensation from other interests which were working to the same end, I say that is something of which the grange knew nothing, could know nothing, and which had not the slightest effect on their action. They took action before they communicated with us, sent out word to the granges, and members started to send in petitions and letters and protests before they had any communication with us; and it can not have, directly or indirectly, any relation to the matter which your committee is considering, which, as I understand it, is this: Is the sentiment of the farmers of North Dakota, Minnesota, Michigan, and Pennsylvania genuine, or is it instigated or accelerated?

Senator STONE. Is that your answer?

Mr. GRAHAM. My answer is, whatever relations we may have had, the grange knew nothing about it at all. We have no arrangements about anything, but we do expect or hope that any manufacturer who is interested in this matter and appreciates the work that we have been able to do will pay us for our work. If they do, I shall be very glad to take it, and I have a right to take it.

Senator STONE. It may stand at that, so far as I am concerned, when you are through.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am through, just for the present.

(From the testimony of Joseph H. Allen.)

My name is Joseph H. Allen, of No. 11 William Street, New York.

Senator STONE. When did you begin to be connected with this campaign against the reciprocity agreement with Canada?

Mr. ALLEN. Why, we commenced the campaign immediately after our conference at the Manhattan Hotel with the legislative committee of the grange.

Senator STONE. What was the date of that?

Mr. ALLEN. Why, I could not state specifically. It was within three or four or five days, I think, after the publication of the treaty.

Senator STONE. After the President's message upon it?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. Have you had frequent consultations since that with Gov. Bachelder?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; I think that we met not less than three or four times after that at the Manhattan Hotel, and I am very certain that we had not less than four meetings in Washington.

Senator STONE. Did you go to his own town in New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; I have never been to Concord. I have not met him except at New York and Washington; I had occasion to go to Albany to see the commissioner of highways, and I think I met Gov. Bachelder there; but with the exception of that the only places that we have conferred have been New York and Washington.

Senator STONE. Did you confer with any of the manufacturers respecting the reciprocity treaty, with a view of interesting them in the noise you were making on it?

Mr. ALLEN. I am pausing for an answer, because I can not recollect that I approached any manufacturers. Some manufacturers did come and talk to me, but I can not remember that I approached any manufacturers.

Senator STONE. Did you ask any manufacturer at any time or suggest to him that he should contribute to the expenses of the campaign?

Mr. ALLEN. I think to such manufacturers as came to me I did suggest that they ought to contribute. I said it would be a pretty hard fight, probably, and it was not right that all the expenses should be borne by the National Grange. But up to the present time we have received nothing except from one manufacturer, and I have no objection to giving his name except that he asked me to keep it from the committee; but I can assure you that he does not manufacture paper or pulp and has nothing to do with the lumber industry. This subscription was made through the National Grange.

Senator STONE. Do you mean to say that that manufacturer contributed some money to the National Grange?

Mr. ALLEN. No; he approached Gov. Bachelder and asked the governor if it would be in harmony with the ideas of the National Grange to make a subscription to us, and the governor told him that it would be.

Senator STONE. Did you ask anyone, any manufacturer, or any other interested person outside of the grange to contribute or suggest that a contribution should be made to the campaign?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not say that I did. There were several manufacturers who offered to contribute, and I said we would be very glad to receive them.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. What kind of manufacturers were they—what lines of business?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I met Mr. Bronson, of the lumber company; I met Mr. Hastings.

Senator STONE. Mr. Bronson, of Chicago?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. I had never met him before, but he introduced himself to me.

Senator STONE. And did he contribute?

Mr. ALLEN. He did not.

Senator STONE. He offered to contribute, or did you merely suggest that he should?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I think the suggestion came from him.

Senator STONE. That he would contribute?

Mr. ALLEN. He said that he would; or, rather, he said he thought they ought to.

Senator STONE. And you agreed with him that they should?

Mr. ALLEN. Why, certainly; I would have taken a contribution if he had given it.

Senator STONE. He did not give it?

Mr. ALLEN. He did not give it; no, sir.

Senator STONE. What did he say about contributing?

Mr. ALLEN. I can hardly recollect so as to give an accurate answer to that question. I might remark that this work we are doing for reciprocity is distasteful to me. It has never appealed to us as a business proposition; it certainly has never appealed to me. I was probably more disappointed than anybody else when the President summoned Congress in special session, and I would be very glad to have it over with now; and I told the legislative committee of the grange so at the last meeting. I told them I should be very glad if we could get out of this, after giving all of our time, with a loss of two or three thousand dollars.

Senator STONE. I repeat my question. What did Mr. Bronson say to you about contributing to the expenses of this antireciprocity campaign?

Mr. ALLEN. He asked me if we would receive it. I said we would. He said he would have to take the matter up when he went to Chicago, and I said nothing more about it; and I do not think that I mentioned the subject to him, although I have seen him since, and I say that it was immaterial to me whether he contributed or not.

Senator STONE. Immaterial?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I was not very anxious to receive it.

Senator STONE. You were not anxious, but you would be glad to get it.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I would not have refused the subscription. I think he had a perfect right to offer it, and I had a perfect right to take it. I do not see that I did not.

Senator STONE. How many other manufacturers did you confer with on that subject here in Washington?

Mr. ALLEN. I did not confer with any, except those who mentioned the subject to me. I would like to make it clear in my answer that I did not approach these manufacturers; they spoke to me.

Senator STONE. I am asking who they were?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I saw Mr. Hastings, of the American Pulp & Paper Association.

Senator STONE. He is president of the——

Mr. ALLEN. The American Pulp & Paper Association.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Did Mr. Hastings think he ought to contribute, too?

Mr. ALLEN. He certainly did.

Senator STONE. And you thought he ought?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I did not express any opinion. I said I would be very glad to receive it. He has not contributed. We have no agreement with him that he will contribute, and I have no way to compel him to contribute; but if he does contribute, I shall gladly take it.

Senator STONE. You will keep it?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I expect there will be a deficit anyway in our expenses, so that we would apply it to that.

Senator STONE. Now, we have Mr. Bronson and Mr. Hastings, with whom you have talked upon the subject of compensation for your services.

Mr. ALLEN. Rather they talked with me, Senator. I did not approach them. I think that is very important.

* * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Now, any others?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not remember. I can not think of any. There may have been. I can not remember at the moment.

Senator STONE. Do you know Chester W. Lyman?

Mr. ALLEN. I have known Mr. Lyman for 12 or 15 years socially. I have played golf with him. I had never known him in a business way. I have met him here in Washington.

Senator STONE. Did you ever talk with him about this fight against reciprocity?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I have talked with him more or less about it, and sympathized with him; I think he is right.

Senator STONE. Have you been to his office at 30 Broad Street?

Mr. ALLEN. I have.

Senator STONE. And have talked with him there about it?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; I called on him there and talked with him about it.

Senator STONE. Talked with him about it over the phone?

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly I did.

Senator STONE. Did he say anything to you about contributing?

Mr. ALLEN. I think Mr. Lyman did, but my understanding was that if we had any contribution from that interest it would come from the American Pulp & Paper Association.

Senator STONE. Mr. Lyman is the secretary and assistant president of the International Paper Co., is he not?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Senator STONE. That is a company interested in the manufacture of print paper; they have some 40 or 50 companies merged into the one holding, have they not?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know; they may have. I do not know anything about the company.

Senator STONE. It is frequently referred to as the Paper Trust?

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose it has been, and is, and will be. I have no knowledge about how many mills they have or whether their mills are antiquated or whether they will be. I have not paid any attention whatever to that side of the question.

Senator STONE. How much force did you have in your employ to send out this literature?

Mr. ALLEN. Not very large; I think two girls for addressing envelopes and two stenographers. We do not require a very large force, because this literature is often sent to the State masters of the various granges for distribution. Then, too, the State masters frequently prepare their own circulars; get up their own literature.

Senator STONE. You had two girls and two or three stenographers in addition——

Mr. ALLEN. That is our regular staff, Senator. We employed no extra help.

Senator STONE. You used your regular staff in distributing this literature?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Senator HEYBURN. I did not understand that he said they distributed it, except to send it to the local granges.

Senator STONE. You send it to the masters of the State granges?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; it was sent to Gov. Bachelder. Under his order we also sent literature to the various State masters, by express, for distribution. In that way the work has been carried on very cheaply.

Senator STONE. You mean when literature was prepared you would express a package of it to a State master or to some individual for distribution in that State?

Mr. ALLEN. No; they all go to the State masters.

Senator STONE. Well, to State masters; you did not send any to any State where there was no State master?

Mr. ALLEN. Not unless Gov. Bachelder forwarded to us a letter from some outside farm organization asking for some of the grange literature.

* * * * * * * *

Senator STONE. Do you know William M. Wood, president of the American Woolen Co.?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; I do not know him.

Senator STONE. Did you send any communication or your firm send any communication to him?

Mr. ALLEN. Absolutely not; he called me up on the phone.

Senator STONE. You had a talk about this over the phone?

Mr. ALLEN. I think it was about the reciprocity bill.

Senator STONE. About this antireciprocity campaign?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Senator STONE. What was that conversation?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not remember exactly.

Senator STONE. The substance of it and exactly what it was, as nearly as you can remember.

Mr. ALLEN. I think he said that the American Woolen Co. or the National Association of Woolen Manufacturers would help financially in this campaign; he thought they would; and I said we would be very glad to receive any amount that he contributed, but he failed to make good.

* * * * * * * *

Senator SMOOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question. Mr. Allen, did you prepare the list of articles showing the rate of duty into Canada and into the United States that was presented by Gov. Bachelder?

Mr. ALLEN. He asked us to have those rates prepared for him. We asked somebody to do it for us, and when these rates were called in question Mr. Graham and I looked them over, and I think an explanatory note was written to the chairman of the Finance Committee by Gov. Bachelder.

Senator SMOOT. Then you admit that there were a great many of them that were quoted wrong?

Mr. ALLEN. They were probably incorrect, and they were only intended to be indicative of the different rates prevailing between Canada and this country.

Senator SMOOT. Mr. Chairman, so that there will be no mistake and that all of the rates may be absolutely as recorded by the Canadian Statistical Abstract and also the Statistical Abstract of our country, I would like to file this and have put in the record the rates as they really are, if there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement will be put into the record.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I had intended to make some remarks on this bill to-day, but I give notice now that after the speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to-morrow, if time permits, I shall submit some remarks on this question.

THE STANDARD OIL AND AMERICAN TOBACCO COS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow after the close of the routine morning business I shall call up the resolution known as Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, relative to the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. prosecutions, and ask for action thereon.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 20, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Father, teach us the simplicity, beauty, and sublimity of the religious life apart from the creeds and dogmas of men, that we may walk together with Thee in faith, hope, and love; each for all and all for each; in the spirit of Him who taught us to pray:

Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.

Give us this day our daily bread.

And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.

And lead us, not into temptation, but deliver us from Evil: For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 15, 1911, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2653. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2958. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected."

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 2653. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce to the House that this is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the proceedings under the calendar set for to-day be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with for to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the gentleman from Alabama what business is coming up in the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand there is a conference report on an appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted therefor, the motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL SATURDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will designate Mr. ROBINSON, of Arkansas, to preside on Saturday.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, I move the election of Mr. CHARLES H. BURKE, of South Dakota, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of a Member.

The SPEAKER. At the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, the gentleman from Alabama moves the election of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota to a place on the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. J. M. C. SMITH was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 2836, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

INVESTIGATION OF THE STEEL TRUST.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 243.

Be it resolved, etc., That the special committee created under the provisions of the House resolution No. 148 be authorized to sit (as a whole or by subcommittee) at such places as it may deem necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just reported to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman that resolutions of this sort might properly lie over, so that we could see them in print. Is there such an emergency about this that it could not be acted upon on Saturday?

Mr. STANLEY. I think so; yes. It simply gives us the right to sit in other places than Washington. A similar resolution was passed the other day for another special committee.

Mr. MANN. It has been called to my attention that various investigating committees are appointing small subcommittees where there is no occasion for it, to carry on investigations that ought to be carried on by the full committees, where all the minority members may attend and have notice. I would like to have an opportunity to look at this resolution.

Mr. STANLEY. If that is the only objection, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that this resolution is unanimously approved by the whole committee, and there is no disposition on the part of this committee to do anything of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Well, I understand; but under the form of the resolution, as I caught it—and it is not always easy to get these things by hearing them read from the Clerk's desk—the gentleman may appoint one member of this committee to go to California and conduct an investigation with no minority member present at all.

Mr. STANLEY. Under the rules of this committee, already adopted, a subcommittee of that kind would not be appointed.

Mr. MANN. The rules of the committee may be easily changed. I suggest to the gentleman that he do not press his proposition to-day, and let it go over.

Mr. STANLEY. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not object on a ground of that kind, because there is absolutely no disposition on the part of this committee to do anything of that kind. If any other committee is liable to do it, I submit to the gentleman that it will then be time to object.

Mr. MANN. I will say, Mr. Speaker, there has already been a report filed in this House by a committee of investigation, based upon an investigation by a subcommittee, where the minority members were not only not notified, but not notified after they were requested to be notified—a literally unfair proposition and unjustifiable under any circumstances. While I do not make any personal criticism of that committee or the chairman of it, whom I hold in as high regard as I do the gentleman from Kentucky, yet we have some rights on this side of the House. While we have not been very obstreperous in making objections to requests of this kind, still we are entitled to have our rights protected by the committees; and if the committees will not protect them, we will have to protect them in the House as well as we can.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution in its present form was not submitted to the committee. There was no bad faith in this. The chairman was directed to get the authority from the House to sit outside of the city of Washington. I will ask the chairman if he is not entirely willing to omit from the resolution that portion permitting subcommittees to sit. I think that would remove all the objection, and there is some importance in having this matter passed at an early time, if it is to be passed at all.

Mr. STANLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I am perfectly willing to have the subcommittee provision omitted from the resolution, with the understanding that at some future date the committee will not be precluded by inference even from meeting and agreeing to a resolution to allow subcommittees to sit, if necessary.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Of course, no action that was taken here could cut off the committee from taking some further action at some other time.

Mr. STANLEY. I am perfectly willing to have the resolution passed as amended in that way.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Kentucky what additional expense, if any, will this resolution incur?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not know that there will be any great amount of expense. It is more expensive to sit in New York than it is to sit here, of course.

Mr. GARNER. Is it more expensive to send for the witnesses and have them come to the city of Washington than it is for the committee to go to New York and sit there?

Mr. STANLEY. I have never examined into that question, but I presume it would be.

Mr. MANN. More expensive for the witnesses, undoubtedly.

Mr. GARNER. I do not know about that. I know that one committee has already had a resolution passed by the House authorizing it to sit elsewhere, and has gone to New York, and it seems to me that the anticipated expense of that committee would have paid for summoning quite a number of witnesses from the city of New York to Washington.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement was made in reference to that committee that the illness of several witnesses made it impossible for them to come to Washington.

Mr. GARNER. That statement has not been made in this case, and unless very good reason is given for this committee sitting outside of Washington, I shall object myself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The mere fact that the committee may believe it desirable to sit elsewhere is not sufficient. The committee should give the reasons which make it necessary to sit elsewhere. Under this resolution the committee, if necessary, could go to Brussels and sit there to investigate concerning the recent convention there. There is no limitation whatever on the power that is given to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not objected yet. I thought the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was about to object.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STANLEY. I do.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to permit the committee to hold its sessions in the city of New York, and the reason for desiring to hold those sessions there, as was stated in the committee, is that it would be a matter of great convenience for the committee to be, for a few days, at a point where it itself could have access to the books of the Steel Corporation, which are there. These books are very voluminous. There are only a comparatively few of them that we wish to see, but we can not tell in advance what they are. It is impracticable to remove them all to the city of Washington.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I have not the floor. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] has the floor. He yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether it is contemplated that the committee will visit any other place than the city of New York? I have in mind a statement appearing in the press to the effect that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], had visited Pittsburg and other points for the purpose of ascertaining something about what the books contain. I think the House ought to know something about the contemplated expenses of this committee before it is authorized to sit all over the country.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, it is not contemplated at the present time to sit anywhere except in the city of New York, and I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that I am not in the confidence of the majority of this committee and I do not know how far their intentions may go. As I stated before, this resolution was not prepared in the committee, and my understanding at the time was that it would be a resolution limited to the city of New York, but I do not know that that was expressly stated. The New York meeting was the only one talked of.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. In the committee—it is no secret—we requested Mr. BARTLETT to draw this resolution, and he did it.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. And that is the resolution. The whole committee requested it.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there any objection to limiting this investigation to New York?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. There would not be on my part.

Mr. MANN. At this time?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. At this time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will not be any captious objection to this resolution going through just as it is so as to permit the steel investigation committee to go wherever it thinks best. It does not make any difference whether it costs a little more or a little less, it is of the greatest importance that the committee should not be hampered in any way in getting at the facts. It has become perfectly evident during the investigation as hitherto conducted that we can not do our work systematically unless we go to New York. For example, we get on the witness stand some individual who has a knowledge of a large range of subjects connected with this inquiry. We inquire of the witness as to one subject first, and then of another, and then of another. He goes back to New York and after a few days perhaps we send for him again.

The result has been that instead of taking up this inquiry subject by subject—taking up, for instance, first, the question of the absorption of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co. and then the question of the cost of steel rails, or the question of the ore lands—we have to go skipping about from one branch of the subject to another simply because we have on hand witnesses who understand many different phases of the subjects we are investigating. Now, if we go to New York—and it is our intention to go to New York if the House will allow us to do so—then we can take this inquiry up subject by subject. If, for instance, we start in with the absorption of the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., we can easily hear our witness and then say to him that he may go back to his office and that we shall not again disturb him until we are obliged to do so. It is not unlikely that he may inform us of somebody else there in New York who can tell us what we wish to know. It will then be an easy matter to get the man we seek that same afternoon. Here in Washington we have found that we must continually send to New York for witnesses and then wait three or four days while we shift to some other branch of our subject. I give it as my opinion to the House that in order to conduct this investigation intelligently we must go to New York, and I also assure the House that if the chairman of the committee, Mr. STANLEY, desires to go to Pittsburg or anywhere else, I believe that it is in the public interest that he shall have a perfectly free opportunity to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the House is willing at any time to give to the committee every facility for holding investigations and meeting wherever it is necessary. It seems to be shown now that the committee ought to hold a meeting in New York. There are so many of these committees operating that we have to be a little more cautious in setting precedents than we otherwise would, and I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his resolution to authorize the committee to meet in New York City, and he can bring in any other propositions as they are needed.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, at the present time it is not the intention of the committee to go anywhere except to New York. It is true that the chairman of the committee has been in Pittsburg and has been in New York and several other places.

Mr. MANN. No one is criticizing the chairman for that; quite the contrary.

Mr. STANLEY. And I will say that I had the pleasure of going to the city of Pittsburg when the thermometer was about 100° in the shade——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has a peculiar idea of pleasure.

Mr. STANLEY. And the pleasure of going through steel mills and standing around red-hot ingots at that temperature. If there is any gentleman in this House who thinks it is a picnic, I will pay his expenses to go and try it. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say this, that it may be necessary for this committee at any time to go to some other city besides New York. I will explain. We have been examining the books of the United States Steel Corporation. We have an expert on those books. We have asked for certain documents, showing the cost of production, for instance. They produced the documents, giving us the number of tons, but tell us they do not think it is right to show the cost of production. I will give that as a single instance. They do not refuse to produce the document absolutely, but they say they wish to consult the committee about it.

There are to-day 10 or 15 highly important exhibits held up in New York to which our representative has no access awaiting the action of the committee. If we were in New York to-day, we could settle that question in five minutes. I believe I speak for this whole committee when I say they are in deadly earnest. They have no purpose and no desire either to squander the money in the Federal Treasury or to go upon a junket, and I know that it is absolutely necessary to a thorough, honest, searching investigation of this corporation that this committee should be given a free hand to go and find the truth wherever it may be necessary [applause], and for that reason I think this committee should be absolutely untrammeled, as far as it properly can be, in making this investigation?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the chairman of this committee if there has been an effort made to find out the conditions among the employees of the Steel Corporation or the treatment of that corporation toward their employees?

Mr. STANLEY. Under this resolution we have that right, and that question will be reached. Individual members of this committee have investigated that question. If the gentleman desires and will come to my office at any time, I would take great pleasure in showing him just exactly how far we have gone in that respect in the way of accumulating data; but there has been no hearing on that subject yet. This is such an immense question we have not reached that phase of it, but we certainly mean to inquire into it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I want to say it is my opinion that this is one of the most important features of this question.

Mr. STANLEY. I entirely agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The conditions under which the men are working, the methods that have been practiced by this Steel Trust in taking the liberties of their workmen away from them, employing a large per cent of foreigners while pretending to want a tariff for the protection of American workmen, employing those foreigners while American workmen are walking the streets, and absolutely coercing and taking their liberties away from the men who have been employed by them who desire to exercise their influence as free American workmen. I say to the chairman as well as to this House I think this is one of the most important features from the point of view of the great mass of the workingmen of this country, and I did hope at the time this committee was created that a sincere and earnest investigation would be made for the purpose of bringing out all the facts in regard to this matter, and I still hope it will be done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understood the resolution was to be modified.

Mr. STANLEY. I agreed to a modification of the resolution by striking out the words "by subcommittee."

Mr. MANN. I would like to have the resolution reported as modified.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STANLEY. I yield.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I proposed to ask that the resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution as it will read as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the special committee created under the provisions of House resolution 148 be authorized to sit at such places as it may deem necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question first is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution was reported as modified, so there is no amendment pending.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. MANN. On what page of the RECORD is it printed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is printed in Saturday's RECORD, page 2941.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] calls up a conference report on the deficiency bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. The Clerk will read the statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report. I have not had time to look at it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report first.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12109) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6 and 8.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment, after the word "Congress," insert the following: "being for the fiscal year 1912"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of line 6 of said amendment strike out the word "herewith" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hereby"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For compiling and editing the edition of the Congressional Directory for the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, $800"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.
F. E. WARREN,
ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
C. A. CULBERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House agree to the report.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, in reference to the item for preparing the Congressional Directory, to whom that money has been paid, and if it is a matter of contract; that is, farmed out, or what is done with it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has not been paid to anybody.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Has it been promised to be paid, then?

Mr. GARNER. Who controls the employment of the man to make up the Congressional Directory?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The reason I ask this is that it has come to my knowledge, and it has been told me, that the contract is given to some one for the amount of $800, and that he farms this out to some other person for $200 to do the work and pockets the difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, for a number of years a gentleman by the name of Halford, I believe it was, who had a seat on the floor as a representative of a press association, did this work. There has been carried in the legislative appropriation act each year $1,600 for the preparation of the Congressional Directory, and it is paid for two editions of the Directory—$800 for each edition. My recollection is that it was stated that a gentleman named Henry had been employed by the Joint Committee on Printing to prepare the Directory, and that he was the person to whom the money was to be paid.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Is it a fact—does the gentleman know—that this man Henry does the work or secures the contract for doing the work and then sublets the contract to a man by the name of Sherman, in the Government Printing Office, who does it all for a matter of $200?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information about that. I imagine whoever does the work has some clerical assistance. The Joint Committee on Printing has control of the matter, and always has had control of it. The item in the appropriation bill authorized the Secretary of the Senate to pay out of the contingent fund the usual compensation.

The House conferees insisted that some specific sum should be named, and the statement was then made that $800 was the sum usually paid and the amount to be paid for the work at this time; and accordingly that sum was specified, so that there would be no question as to the amount.

Mr. GARNER. Does the Appropriations Committee, in its hearings, make some inquiry as to the amount of money necessary to pay for the performance of this work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations has no direct control over this item. It appears that heretofore $800 has been paid for services of this character. The Joint Committee on Printing had the directory prepared. It was stated that it had made an arrangement similar to the arrangement made on former occasions, to pay the person engaged for the purpose of doing this work the sum of $800, and that as it was the duty of the Joint Committee on Printing to make the arrangement, the work having been done, Congress is under obligation to pay for the service rendered.

Mr. GARNER. I understand the contention of the gentleman from New York, then, is that the reason why the Committee on Appropriations did not have any hearings and investigate the necessity or the exact amount necessary to do the work is that they depended on the Joint Committee on Printing and its recommendations as to what it should do?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from New York did not make that statement.

Mr. GARNER. Just one moment——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me interrupt. The gentleman from New York did not make that statement. This matter did not come before the Committee on Appropriations. It was a Senate amendment.

Mr. GARNER. The conference committee——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me to continue the statement, the managers on the part of the House did make some inquiry, and they had the chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing present at the conference, and he made a statement regarding the matter.

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I want to place the responsibility of saying to the House that it is necessary for $800 to be expended for the purpose of getting up these directories; and I understood the gentleman from New York to say that the Appropriations Committee had no hearing and that they depended largely upon the Joint Committee on Printing for their authority for making the appropriation. Now, I want the RECORD to show whether or not the Committee on Printing made any investigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no knowledge——

Mr. GARNER. And, if the gentleman will permit me to continue the statement——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no knowledge of what investigation the Joint Committee on Printing made. The Joint Committee on Printing made the arrangement and had the directory prepared, as it has the authority to do, and it made the arrangement to pay the sum which heretofore has been paid for this purpose; and when the question came as to whether the House conferees should agree to an appropriation to pay for the services rendered under an arrangement of that character, the only question that the House conferees had to investigate was whether the arrangement had been made—whether the service had been rendered.

The responsibility for the compensation to be paid perhaps is divided; because for a great number of years the legislative bill has carried an appropriation of $1,600 for each year, and $800 has been paid for the preparation of each Directory; and in the Sixty-first Congress, when a third edition of the Directory was prepared, $800 was paid to Mr. Halford for the preparation of the third edition of the Directory.

Mr. GARNER. If I remember correctly, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has been a member of the Appropriations Committee for some years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Now, I ask him whether or not, as a member of that committee, the committee investigated this item when it came to make the appropriation for the fiscal year 1911; and if you did not investigate it, if it turns out as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has suggested, that you appropriate $800 a year for this work, and it is farmed out for $200 a year, is it not a matter of fact that the Appropriations Committee recommended $600 a year more than is necessary?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not the fact at all. There is no proof here on the subject. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] makes the statement that somebody has informed him that the person who is engaged to do this work turns it over to somebody else to do the entire work and pays him $200. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] does not state that he knows that to be a fact. Neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] nor myself seems to have any information as to the source or character of this informant.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that I think his colleague [Mr. AKIN of New York], who is here, will be able to give him some more information directly upon this subject than I will be able to give, and I think there is something to this report that this matter has been farmed out for $200, and possibly the $600 is profit to the contractor for being the boss.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be, but——

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. It seems pretty good authority.

Mr. GARNER. Four times more than is necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The work of the preparation of the Congressional Directory has never been under my charge, nor has it been a matter of so much importance that I have attempted to trace whether the person engaged to do the work has done all the work himself and kept the money, or whether he has engaged help and paid out some of the money.

The work is done under the scrutiny of the Joint Committee on Printing. That committee has jurisdiction of this matter, and for a number of years the work has been turned over to one of the men representing some press association or some newspaper. The arrangement is made between the person selected and the Joint Committee on Printing, and following that custom the arrangement was made in this instance. Whether the gentleman selected found this task was much simpler than the Joint Committee on Printing assumed, and that he could do it much more easily than anyone suspected, I do not know.

Mr. GARNER. I was trying to ascertain, Mr. Speaker, from the gentleman from New York whether or not when this committee comes to this item in an appropriation bill they simply take the statement of the Joint Committee on Printing as to the amount necessary, or do they make an investigation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the gentleman from New York has never faced that situation thus far. The committee over which the gentleman from New York has the honor to preside has not originated an appropriation for this purpose, so that this item not having originated with the committee, a different question entirely was presented.

The Senate placed an amendment upon this bill providing that the usual sum for the preparation of the Congressional Directory for this session of Congress should be paid by the Secretary of the Senate out of the contingent fund of the Senate for the Directory as prepared and published under the direction and supervision of the Joint Committee on Printing. The managers on the part of the House believed that the expression "the usual compensation" was somewhat too indefinite and insisted that the sum to be paid should be specified, so that there would be no question of what the sum was to be paid.

Mr. AKIN of New York rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when I can finish this statement in a connected manner I will yield, but until then I do not desire to be interrupted. The managers on the part of the House sought to ascertain under what circumstances the Directory had been published, and they ascertained that it had been prepared and published under the supervision of the Joint Committee on Printing, and that the Joint Committee on Printing had made an arrangement with Mr. Henry to edit the Directory and had agreed that he should be paid $800 for that work; that $800 was the amount that hitherto had been paid for the preparation of an edition of the Directory, and then the managers on the part of the House were able to have the Senate managers agree to state that the amount to be paid should be $800.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to take this matter up in regard to my being misrepresented as to what my politics were in this House. I saw Mr. SMOOT, and I found that the trouble lay with a man by the name of Henry, who had charge of this work. I then proceeded down to this building where this gentleman, Mr. Henry, had his office, he having the work in charge, as I supposed. I did not find Mr. Henry there, but I found a man there named Sherman, who was compiling the Directory, and I wanted to know of him why it was that in my biography the word "Republican" had been stricken out and the word "Democrat" put in there. Mr. Sherman, it appears, had the paper in his pocket, instead of having it in the files, and I asked of him why that was, and he said, "for my own protection." I said: "Did you change it?" He said: "No, sir; I did not." I said: "Who did?" He said: "Mr. Henry changed it." I said: "Now, if you will tell me the truth about this matter, I will see that everything is all right as far as you are concerned, but I want to know the truth about it. How much do you get for doing this work?" He said: "I get $200." "How much is paid to Mr. Henry?" "Eight hundred dollars." "And what does Mr. Henry do?" "Why, he is a press agent for some paper in Philadelphia." "Does he ever come here?" "Occasionally, but not very often. I have done the work with my wife after 6 o'clock at night, after my work was through with in the Printing Office; I have come here with my wife and compiled this Directory for $200."

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the statement the man made to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I want to get the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] for a moment. He has just made a statement with regard to a gentleman whom I know very well, and I wanted to inquire of him as to that gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not hear the gentleman's request.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] has just made a reference to Mr. Henry, who represented a Philadelphia newspaper. Whether he does now or not I do not know. I know Mr. Henry very well. He is a responsible man in the newspaper business, a man of good standing in the city of Washington and throughout the country. He was formerly president of the Gridiron Club of Washington. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] whether the inquiry made of the employee in the office was followed up by the gentleman from New York, and whether he saw Mr. Henry?

Mr. AKIN of New York. I will say this, I telephoned Mr. Henry three different times asking him to come to my office and see me in regard to making this change in my biography, and he refused to come. When I went to his office I was told that he was not in, but I really think he was in. [Laughter.] I do not care whether he is a Gridiron Club man or what he is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be. I am only speaking for a man whom I have not seen recently, but whom I happen to know. I am making inquiry whether the gentleman had followed up the investigation apparently begun with the young man who told about the $200 arrangement.

Mr. AKIN of New York. All the work I can find he did was to erase the word "Republican" and put in the word "Democrat." That is all I can find out.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. And for which he is paid $600.

Mr. AKIN of New York. And got $600 for doing so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman another question. Mr. Henry has been ill. Has the gentleman been aware of that fact?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Maybe that made him sick.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am only endeavoring to obtain a fair hearing for a gentleman who has been accused upon the floor and who is not here to speak for himself. I know absolutely nothing about this matter except that the Mr. Henry who has been referred to by the gentleman from New York is an entirely responsible and wholly reputable newspaper man. I want to ask the gentleman from New York whether he knew Mr. Henry has been very ill recently?

Mr. AKIN of New York. He was not ill at that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman says he did not see Mr. Henry and attempted to get him over the telephone. Does not the gentleman think that is rather an unfair statement to make in this way when Mr. Henry has not been seen and no word has been had from him upon the subject at all?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Mr. Henry was expected to be there within an hour, so his wife told me, and——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman ever been in a great newspaper office, or a printing office where considerable work is done in compiling data and work of that kind——

Mr. AKIN of New York. Undoubtedly I have, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will go into one of the newspaper offices in his own State, he would find many men employed, some of them unfortunately, it is true, at not very large salaries, who do a great deal of routine work. Some one must direct and edit the work.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Let me interrupt the gentleman just at that point. When I called Mr. Sherman's attention to this matter to make the change he said Mr. Henry had asked him to change it, but he refused to do it. Then he said, "All right, give me the paper," and he wrote the word "Democrat" in there. Furthermore, Mr. Sherman said he requested him that he had better go to see Mr. AKIN to find out whether this matter was satisfactory to him or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As to the amount of money to be paid I know nothing about it. It is a matter upon which the committee has reported, but the gentleman bases a statement which is serious, so far as it affects the character of the man concerned, upon an attempt to reach Mr. Henry over the telephone.

Mr. AKIN of New York. They had the record, the biography, just as Mr. Sherman has got it, and it is locked up on purpose, so that he can put it on to Henry if there is any trouble about it. It is in his handwriting.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that there is considerable doubt as to whether——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would be perfectly willing, Mr. Speaker, to give gentlemen some information, but I desire to say that the conversation between those gentlemen is being conducted in such a way that I am unable to hear whether I am being criticized or not.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for order, so that the gentleman from New York can recover from his peevishness. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor and the control of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentlemen will speak loudly enough so that others can hear their conversation, I have no objection to their making whatever statements they may see proper to make.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York should remember that we Members on this side ought to be able to hear as well as those on that side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. This is a matter which affects the Public Treasury, and the Members of the House and the Speaker have the right to hear what is said. Gentlemen in the aisles will take their seats.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was attempting to interrogate the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] from the floor, but was prevented from continuing by the Speaker, who directed all Members to their seats. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was unable to hear the two gentlemen from New York, and that is why he left his seat; now he is endeavoring to make himself heard throughout this Hall to the satisfaction of the Speaker. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] a little further about his "exposé" of Mr. Henry. Is it not a fact that the objections which seem to have arisen in the gentleman's mind in regard to the payment of the sum for the compilation of the Congressional Directory were due to the designation of the gentleman as a "Democrat," when he should not have been so designated?

Mr. MANN. That is the claim.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not that the fact?

Mr. AKIN of New York. This matter came up through my investigation of the whole matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman blame Mr. Henry for not being able to designate the gentleman when the gentleman was unable to designate himself?

Mr. AKIN of New York. The biography was written in my own handwriting, by myself, and my name was set down there as a Republican. Mr. Sherman says Mr. Henry did it with his own hands.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How was the gentleman placed in his own description of himself?

Mr. AKIN of New York. He was designated as a Republican.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not the floor, but I would be glad to yield for a minute.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to ask the gentleman from New York if he thought every flowery statement in these biographical sketches which are furnished by Members themselves, with a view to advertise themselves, is to be taken as literally true, and if it would not be well for the man in charge to exercise generally such discretion as he has done in this case?

Mr. AKIN of New York. If the gentleman from Illinois can find anything flowery in that description of myself, he is welcome to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It may be in the very fact that the gentleman describes himself as a Republican.

Mr. AKIN of New York. I am not ashamed of either side, but I am going to be put down there exactly right.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in line with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, with the biography of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] before me, in 10 lines I see he twice states in that biography that he is a farmer by occupation. I would like to inquire if the gentleman does not think that one statement of that kind would be sufficient? [Laughter.]

Mr. AKIN of New York. If the gentleman will read it more carefully, he will see that I stated that my father was a farmer and that I am a farmer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to propound an inquiry to the gentleman: Did not the people in the last election rub out the word "Republican" and insert "Democrat"?

Mr. AKIN of New York. The Republican was rubbed out by the Democrats up in my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is not at all a matter of surprise that the gentleman who is expected to prepare this Directory made some slight error in the cataloguing of my colleague from New York. My recollection is that in one of the early Democratic caucuses my colleague [Mr. AKIN of New York] was listed on the Democratic caucus list as an Independent Democrat, and it was believed that he would participate in Democratic caucuses and affiliate with the Democrats in the House. My recollection is that he was nominated by the Democrats and by the Independent Republicans.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Now, I hope the gentleman will state this correctly. I was not nominated by the Democrats.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was the gentleman indorsed by them?

Mr. AKIN of New York. Yes. There is a great deal of difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, on the gentleman's own statement, under the election law of the State of New York the gentleman was "nominated" by the Democrats, and I am technically correct in my statement. The gentleman was nominated by the Democrats, and his name was in good faith placed upon the roll of the Democratic caucus.

Information was afterwards conveyed to one of his colleagues that he was not a Democrat and would not act with the Democrats in the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I——

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment, if the gentleman please. The name of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN] was taken from the Democratic roll. It is just possible that under these circumstances an error could be made in good faith by the person designated to compile the Congressional Directory, in characterizing the politics of the gentleman from New York; but Mr. Henry, the gentleman in charge of this work, is a gentleman who, as I now recall it, has been representing some papers here for some years. I am slightly acquainted with him. He is a man of integrity. My recollection is refreshed that the statement was made in conference that at the time the gentleman was engaged in this work he was not engaged in newspaper work, and that this was his sole occupation at the time. It may be that he did employ other persons to assist him more or less in the compilation of this work, but I would not like to characterize him in an improper manner without having his side of the matter properly presented.

Mr. AKIN of New York. The question is whether they paid $800 when they might have got the work done for $200?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to his colleague [Mr. AKIN]?

Mr. AKIN of New York. It is just the difference between $200 and $800. That is the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. AKIN].

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care to have the two gentlemen conduct a debate in my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York refuses to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask him, in the presence of his colleague from New York [Mr. AKIN], whether he thinks $800 is too large a sum of money for editing a volume which contains so many biographies and so much statistical detail as this?

Mr. AKIN of New York. It is, if it can be done for $200.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to get back to the subject. It appears that the Committee on Appropriations has been carrying in its bill for each Congress $1,600 for the compilation of the Congressional Directory—$800 for each session. We are unable to determine whether the Committee on Appropriations made any investigation on its own behalf as to the necessity for this amount, or whether it took the word of the Joint Committee on Printing as to the amount necessary to do it. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is to be hoped that this discussion has drawn the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that this work may be worth the sum of $200 rather than $800, and if the Joint Committee on Printing fail to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to this matter, when they go to make up the next bill, that they will of their own initiative try to ascertain what it is really worth to edit this publication, and not pay some man four times what it is worth simply to supervise it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations will take care of itself when it originates any matter.

Mr. GARNER. Well, I want to say——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me make my statement, please. The Committee on Appropriations will be able to answer questions put to it as to such matters, but I do not propose that the gentleman shall attempt to hold me responsible for the action or the failure of Committees on Appropriations in the past.

I am not responsible for what has been done in the past. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has been in Congress a great many years. The legislative bill has carried $1,600 each year that he has been here for the purpose of having the Congressional Directory compiled, and I have never heard him before ask any inquiries, or anybody else, as to the propriety of that appropriation or its expenditure. It has been expended this time as it has been all of the time that the gentleman has been in Congress.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the House passed a resolution reported from the committee of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] a few days ago to pay a considerably larger sum than $200 to some man for making a little comparison, that required only a pair of shears and a paste pot, on the rules of the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It did.

Mr. MANN. And now he speaks of paying $200 for the editing of a volume containing much new matter. It is a wonder the gentleman from Texas did not make the inquiry he had in mind then.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Texas, as a member of the Committee on Accounts, did make some investigation in this matter, and the testimony before that committee was to the effect that the man for whom the appropriation was made had earned the money, and that he had earned it himself; that he had done the work himself. If the testimony before that committee had developed the fact that we were appropriating or proposing to appropriate $300 for his services, and that in reality he had not rendered that service, but had employed some one else to render it, for the sum of $50 or $100, I imagine the members of the Committee on Accounts would not have reported that resolution.

Mr. MANN. Just what they did do was to report the resolution for the principal and for an employee.

Mr. GARNER. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. For both cases; and in this case they did not report a proposition to pay the employee, but only the principal. The same policy was pursued in both cases, so far as the work was concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me make this statement to the gentleman from Texas: There was no testimony before the Committee on Appropriations that somebody else had anything to do with this work, and the gentleman who seemed to have that information kept it carefully to himself.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I have not been criticizing the Committee on Appropriations. I simply call this to their attention in order that they may investigate the matter themselves and ascertain whether there is being four times as much paid for this work as is necessary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if we can pass from this item, which is not very important, in this report to some of the other items, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I see that it is proposed to make available for the fiscal year 1912 an appropriation for investigations for the fiscal year 1912 in the Senate. How can that be called a deficiency appropriation, such as would authorize it to be in this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the current fiscal year there was appropriated $25,000 for the payment of expenses incident to investigations conducted by the Senate. For the fiscal year just ended $25,000 was appropriated. The Senate had expended about $12,000 of the appropriation for the fiscal year just ended, and the statement was made that in view of the investigation being conducted by the Senate at this time it would require this money, and that it desired to have it appropriated at this time so that there would be no question that there would be ample funds to enable the Senate to conduct the investigations it is now engaged in.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but there was ample money to conduct any investigation, certainly until the next session of Congress. Now, when I offered an amendment to this bill in the House the other day, the gentleman—and I do not criticize him for it—objected to it because it was not a deficiency. I do not see why we should be so much more liberal in allowing the Senate to put in items which are not deficiencies when we do not allow Members to offer such items.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was this difference: When the gentleman offered his amendment the fiscal year 1911 had not been concluded, but when the Senate proposed to make this balance available for the current fiscal year it was at that time in the fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. That does not make a particle of difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman understands also the fact that in a matter like that the Senate would insist and the House would have to yield upon giving it the money it required for the appropriations.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; not on this kind of a bill it would not.

Now, may I ask the gentleman about another item in the bill, amendment numbered 9, proposing to recede to the State of Georgia jurisdiction over the site on which is located the old Federal building recently sold to the city of Atlanta. That ought not to be placed in a deficiency bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, if——

Mr. MANN. Why is it in there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. While the legislation did not particularly belong to an appropriation bill, it is highly important, and it seemed to be the only way by which this legislation could be enacted.

Mr. MANN. That bill should be reported from the committee that has this matter in charge in this House——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And could be called up on any unanimous-consent day and passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken; that bill could not be reported——

Mr. MANN. If the House will not act on these things, we ought to have a quorum to act on them when they come from the Senate. But what warrant is there that the House majority makes a rule not to report a bill that nobody objects to, but lets the Senate add it on as an amendment and the House is to agree to it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The majority has a right to make a rule about that under the Constitution.

Mr. MANN. The majority has a right to make any foolish rule it pleases, and in this case it has made a foolish rule that reacts upon the Members of the House. What reason is there, when the House will not take action upon an original proposition to which no one objects, that it should ask the Senate to tack it on a bill to which it does not in any way relate and proposes to have that passed practically by unanimous consent in the House? It ought to come up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it practically is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Well, if it takes unanimous consent at that time, it ought to be considered on Monday on unanimous-consent day. We have been trying to get a unanimous-consent day in this House all this session of Congress. Here was a bill that ought to be passed, but the House refuses to pass it in the regular way—a bill to which no one would make objection—but has some Member go over to the Senate and appeal to the Senate to protect the majority of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken; this originated with a Member of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, this originated with the city of Atlanta and was first introduced in the House as a bill and afterwards taken up in the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The sole Senator from Georgia is enlisted on the side of Atlanta——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from New York will remember there was a good deal of talk here some weeks ago about the Committee on Rules nominating to the House the membership of the Steel Trust investigating committee and the Sugar Trust investigating committee. Does not the gentleman really think this matter is one that could properly go before a Democratic caucus and be determined by it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The unfortunate part about the matter is I know of no way by which you can send a House bill with Senate amendments to a caucus.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not want the Appropriations Committee to assume any authority which it did not have, inasmuch as the Rules Committee refused to do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has not. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent the House committed this bill, with these amendments, to conference and appointed managers on the part of the House, and it devolved upon the managers on the part of the House the duty of adjusting this difference between the House and the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the managers on the part of the House have done nothing contrary to the instructions of the House in this matter.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield further, on another item in reference to an appropriation of $5,000 and $150,000 for Fort Mason, Cal.? Why should we put that on a deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman mean the Fort Mason business?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was because the administration, in its attempt to keep down expenditures during the past fiscal year, deliberately cut down the estimate of the amount that was required; and inasmuch as this money is needed by the 1st of September, it is necessary that it should now be appropriated.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is endeavoring to protect the administration?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The gentleman from New York is anxious to appropriate the money required to enable the Government to conduct its business. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Congress in 1907 authorized contracts to the extent of $1,500,000 for the construction of a depot at Fort Mason. It appropriated up to the close of the last Congress $1,150,000. An estimate was submitted in the sundry civil appropriation bill for $200,000. In the examination before the Committee on Appropriations it appeared that all the reports indicated that the work would be completed by the 1st of October, 1911, and that $350,000, the balance of the amount authorized, would be required. The Quartermaster General stated to the Committee on Appropriations that he had prepared an estimate of $350,000 and submitted these facts to the Secretary, but that he had been directed to cut his estimate to $200,000, and the recommendation was made to appropriate the amount estimated.

Now, the other day an estimate was submitted from the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he called attention to the fact that the Secretary of War, in transmitting his request for $150,000, stated that the work would be completed by the 1st of September, 1911, and that the reason why the $150,000 had not been asked for in the last session of Congress was because at the time of the submission of the estimate of $200,000 it was believed that $200,000 would be sufficient for the purpose during the present fiscal year. Of course, that was an inaccurate statement, evidently due to the fact that the Secretary of War was not familiar either with the statement of Gen. Aleshire before the Committee on Appropriations or with the action of his predecessor in directing that the estimate be cut.

Mr. MANN. Was this estimate sent to the House on this item?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It came to the House after the bill had gone to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Then somebody was exceedingly derelict in the department, if they needed this money so badly, when they did not awake to the fact until after the deficiency bill had left the House and had gone to the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this theory of departments, after a bill passes the House, sending in estimates with the expectation of having the Senate put in amendments, very often such as the House would not agree to if considered by the Committee on Appropriations or considered by the House outside of a conference report. Why does not the gentleman throw out this item in conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. These gentlemen who have the contract will have completed their contract by the 1st of September, and they are entitled to be paid, regardless of this mistake.

Mr. MANN. They should take their chances and look out for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could recover the money if it was not available. But we should not penalize the contractors by denying them payment when the money has been earned.

Mr. MANN. Now, as to the item in reference to amending the naval appropriation act, the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has introduced a bill to cover that. Why does not the Committee on Appropriations leave that to the Naval Committee to report upon?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs requested the conferees to care for this item.

Mr. MANN. Very well. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs is a very distinguished and accomplished gentleman, but he is not the entire committee. He introduced a bill and it goes before the Naval Committee. Why can not the Naval Committee act on naval affairs themselves?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They did.

Mr. MANN. Why was not this put on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and called up on Wednesday and passed? Why do we every time miss unanimous-consent day and dispense in that way with calendar proceedings? That item could have been disposed of in that way and a reasonable explanation given.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has read the statement and is fully informed about it.

Mr. MANN. I have read the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, but I will not say that I am fully informed on the subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will explain this item, if the gentleman desires the information.

Mr. MANN. I desire to inform the gentleman now that if it is to be the policy of the majority side of the House that it will not have its own committees report legislation, but proposes to have a lot of these things tacked on to various bills that go to the Senate after they reach the Senate, it will hereafter take a quorum to pass any of these items through the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who has the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. PAYNE. I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does not understand exactly the position and condition of the Democratic Party in the House. He does not seem to understand that that party is in abject fear of itself. It does not dare trust itself to come into the House here and do anything. It refers everything to the Democratic caucus, and Members are tied hand and foot. They come in here, and they do not exercise even what judgment they have upon legislation. They had a fearful example here one day——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Just let me finish this statement and then I will yield. They had a fearful example one day upon that side of the House of what they might do if they only had a chance. They came in here with a campaign-publicity bill, and for some reason or other they had not put the lid on. They had not pledged every Member of that side to vote down any amendment that was offered here in the House as to that bill.

Things went along smoothly until the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] one day offered the most sensible amendment in the world, that that bill should apply to primaries, and it was debated here in Committee of the Whole, and enough gentlemen acted on their own responsibility, and actually had the courage to vote for that amendment, so that there was a majority for it in Committee of the Whole, and the bill was reported with that amendment in it. Then they began to tremble. Abject fear took possession of them again. They did not dare trust themselves or their party, and there was a hurrying and a scurrying around here, until finally they got enough votes to vote the amendment down in the House, and sent the bill over to the Senate without that amendment in it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PAYNE. I wish the gentleman would wait until I finish my statement.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I can help the gentleman's speech a little.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I should like to improve the gentleman's speech.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill went over to the Senate, and for some reason or other there are Democrats in another place who are not afraid of themselves, or afraid of their party, and they do not put everything up to the caucus. They do not bring in a bill and say it must go through without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." They do not come in with a bill, to amend the tariff, perhaps, where really important interests are at stake, and where our friends over on that side see the force and effect and good sense of amendments that are offered, and yet feel that under their hide-bound caucus rule they must vote down every amendment. So these gentlemen in another place amended this sacred publicity act. They were not scared about it. They had sense enough to see the force and effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] here in the House, and they put it into the bill, and I understand now that my good friend from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has at last got it through his cranium that that is a good thing to have in the bill, and that it ought to go in, and I understand he stands ready now to surrender.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE. If no caucus action binds him, he is ready to surrender on that amendment and let it come into the bill. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] must look out for the other side as well as this side, and must make allowance for the bands by which the other side are bound.

Mr. MANN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] think that the greatest example of wisdom shown by the Democratic side of the House is that so far they have left all these propositions to be really perfected by the Republican Senate, being afraid to do anything themselves in the first instance? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, of course.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to say to the very distinguished gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Missouri has not surrendered, but the forces of Democracy are united and we are going to capture the Republicans in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. By giving us our way.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; we are going to give you gentlemen more than you want. The gentleman knows very well that every Democrat has always stood for the utmost publicity that could be obtained, but——

Mr. PAYNE. Why, Mr. Speaker, what does the gentleman mean by stating that after the vote that was seen here in the House, where they voted down all sort of publicity or any kind of publicity in the primary?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Democrats had in mind a recollection of the fact that within a very short time before the vote referred to was taken another body had destroyed publicity by striking out of a House bill the provision requiring publicity before elections. With the new conditions existing at the far end of the Capitol, and anxious to try them again, we submitted to them a clean-cut proposition of publicity before elections. We did not intend to have it loaded down here by amendments proposed by those who would like to defeat the enactment of a publicity law. I make no reflection upon the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON], the author of the amendment referred to, whom I am sure was sincere in his position. But we wanted the bill to go through the House in a form in which we hoped it would be acceptable to the Senate. Let me ask the gentleman, did you believe when we passed that bill, or at any time before the last week, that the Senate would ever enact such a bill as they have now tendered to the House?

Mr. PAYNE. Why, yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. You did?

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Then the gentleman is the most credulous man in the Republican Party. Nobody else believed it.

Mr. PAYNE. I may be credulous, but it happened to turn out that way.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Let me say one other word to the gentleman. I believe some gentlemen are quaking to-day, not Democrats, but gentlemen quaking not for fear that bill will not pass, but for fear the House will pass the bill which has been tendered to us by the Senate, and well they may quake.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there is no iron-bound caucus rule governing this side of the House. We are not afraid that the boys are going to get out of the traces. We are not trembling over here. You are doing all of that shaking in the boots. The gentleman says he is going to give us more than we ask. Are you going to give us more than the Senate asks?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. But the Senate proposes vastly more than the gentleman from Kansas asked.

Mr. PAYNE. He is going to give us just what the gentleman from Kansas asked?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, no.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know, but he is coming along with the 10-cent-a-vote proposition, and maybe he will vote for that. I presume likely he will as his zeal sometimes outruns his discretion.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If you are referring to the Senate amendments to the publicity bill, you would better remain out of the House next week, if you do not favor them, because you will be put to the test.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh well, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to have the 10-cent-a-vote proposition in the bill if they want it. If anybody wants it, I do not care to object to it. I do not care what kind of a publicity bill or how drastic it may be. I would have welcomed one in my district at any time during the last 28 years that I have been running for Congress.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that, and I hope he speaks for his whole party.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, my colleague from New York [Mr. AKIN], whom I understood has decided to be a progressive Republican—I do not see him now—had a little difficulty, of which he spoke a moment ago, with some one down at the Printing Office, and it occurred to me that his proper line would be to ask for an investigating committee on that.

Why, we have got 22 investigations, a list of which I saw in a morning paper of yesterday. We are investigating the Steel Trust; Sugar Trust; Controller Bay land tangle; Indian land scandals; trust-busting expenditures; effort to oust Dr. Wiley; threatened extinction of Pribilof seal herd; government of the District of Columbia; irregularities at the Washington Navy Yard and alleged general extravagance in naval service; alleged persecution of Lewis publications; Railway Mail Service troubles; alleged favoritism shown to Maj. Ray, United States Army, and other charges; extravagance in the United States Army; charges against Attorney General Wickersham in connection with Alaskan syndicate frauds; parcels-post proposition and other postal-service matters; fire protection in Government buildings and governmental methods of constructing Government buildings; violations of civil-service laws; creosote undervaluations; Government's rental of the Union Building; recoveries on sugar frauds; irregularities in the customs service.

Now, why in heaven's name do not some of you gentlemen on that side, bursting to get into the newspapers on some investigation, as chairman of the committee or as the author of a resolution or something of that kind, some of you gentlemen who have been trying to find and have found no band wagon to jump onto, why, in heaven's name, do not you come in here with a resolution appointing a committee with an appropriation of $25,000 to investigate the great question of whether my colleague is correctly put down in the Directory of Congress as a progressive Republican or an independent Democrat? It will bring you fame; else you may sit here through this whole Congress and get none. Some of you who are anxious to fool the people once more in your district, having succeeded last fall, why do not you come in? Here is an opportunity open to all budding statesmen, an opportunity afforded to that side of the House to get almost as much fame from that as you would really to go into a Democratic caucus and say you did your thinking under your own hat; that you wanted to hear this bill discussed in the House by both sides, so that the question may be fairly brought out, before you pledged yourself that you would be guided by the wisdom of a single man in making up a schedule, whether that man happened to be a Member of the House or an alleged expert; that you would vote down all amendments which were put into the bill, and you would stand by it, no matter how ridiculous a bill it was or how much better the amendments might make it. Oh, gentlemen, embrace this opportunity and come on. While the lamp holds out to burn the vilest sinner of you may return in the next election if you on that side of the House only jump on this proposition of Brother AKIN. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that my colleague's memory is so short. While it is usual to hear him bewail the fact that this side will not report legislation, he must recall and others do recall that when that side of the House was in the majority and was convened in extraordinary session it merely delayed the appointment of committees so that it could hold a club over the head of every individual Member on that side of the House to see that the wishes of those in control were carried out. Was the gentleman afraid of that side of the House doing business? They were afraid even to permit that side of the House to be permanently fixed in committee assignments so the Members might be allowed to vote as they pleased. My colleague speaks about the Democratic caucus.

Of course he is unfortunate in belonging to a party that can not get its members into a caucus, and has not been able to do so for a great while [applause on the Democratic side]; but my colleague is a party man who has now become a progressive, believing in the right of the individual Member to act according to the dictates of his own free will, untrammeled by party dictation. I congratulate him upon having followed our distinguished former Speaker in his transit to the progressive stage. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Does my colleague yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. PAYNE. Why in the world were you so prompt in appointing committees if they were not to do anything? Was there any other reason under heaven for appointing them except the fact that you wanted to get the patronage that went with the committees? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes. One other reason was that we wanted to put the Republican incumbents out of their places. That in itself was a sufficient reason.

Mr. MANN. That is committee patronage. That was just a grab job, without the prospect of their doing any work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that my time be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the committees had not been appointed the Republican officials, the Republican appointees, would have held their positions, and there would have been no one in a position to have compelled them to have done any work. The committees of the House have not been idle, even if they have not reported many bills. They have conducted various investigations which may not have been any more pleasing to that side of the House than they have been to the administration in the results so far obtained, and I have no doubt, without regard to any partisanship in the matter, that those investigations will have a wholesome effect on the entire administration and be of great benefit to all the departments of the Government.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman, that if the purpose of appointing committees in this House was to give Democrats patronage, somebody has forgotten something, because I have not received any patronage. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman declined it when the House offered it to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not look at the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] when I made that statement. [Laughter.] I did not say that that was the sole purpose, but I am frank to make the statement that it was a sufficient justification to turn out Republican employees, and not only that, but it enabled the House to abolish useless positions in the organization of the House which were costing the country $100,000 annually. That in itself was sufficient justification.

Mr. MANN. What had that to do with the appointment of all the committees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committees were necessary in order to carry out the program.

Mr. MANN. They did not abolish any of the committees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, if we had pursued the practice of not organizing this side of the House, as was pursued in former Congresses when that side controlled, the white-buttoned mandarins, the select few who had control and management of the House, could have done the work and could have regulated all the affairs of the House, of the committees, and of the caucuses. Only they would have been necessary, and the Members at large would have registered their will.

My colleague talks about tariff legislation and Democratic caucuses. Why, when the Republicans were revising all the tariff schedules opportunity was given to us to offer amendments to only a dozen items of the bill. We, on the other hand, have given you opportunity to introduce amendments ad libitum, and we have had the courage to vote down all the bad amendments that have come from that side, and we have no apologies to offer for so doing.

Mr. MANN. And you had the ignorance to vote down some very good ones. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, Mr. Speaker, in the case of persons who have long been in control and in authority, it is difficult for them to acknowledge that there is any knowledge or wisdom existing anywhere but with themselves. But we are perfectly willing to rest our case with the country in the coming election and to have the people determine whether all the knowledge and information is possessed by that side or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My colleague broke into poetry. I can recall a little squib I read a short time ago and will recite it for his benefit. It ran:

A wise old owl lived in an oak.
The more he lived, the less he spoke.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the gentleman feel at liberty to quote poetry without the authority of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know of no restraint upon freedom of speech within parliamentary limits in the House.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want his time extended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will extend it in the RECORD. I am willing to admit that I am not such an adept in poetry as my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. It runs as follows:

A wise old owl lived in an oak.
The more he lived, the less he spoke;
The less he spoke, the more he heard.
Why can't you be like that wise old bird?

After having relieved himself, as he has to-day, of this burden that was resting upon him over the failure of the Democratic Party to live up to their obligations, I hope my colleague [Mr. PAYNE] will rest in peace, because I can assure him that this side of the House, at the appropriate time, will proceed not only to eliminate all the iniquities from the bill which partly bears his name, but to correct many of the abuses that exist in other laws and in the administration of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Manana!

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield? A moment ago the gentleman spoke of having saved $100,000 by the abolition of useless offices.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My recollection is that the announcement was made a few months ago to the country at large that $188,000 was to be saved by the abolition of these offices. Will the gentleman say whether new offices have been created——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or whether there is now a revision of the figures, or how does the gentleman account for the difference between $100,000 and $188,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House is waiting for another body, controlled by the political associates of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], to finish another part of the work, and the balance will be saved in withholding the extra month's pay.

Mr. MANN. That original statement still remains a matter of vivid imagination.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely wanted to know whether there had been any retrogression in the policy of the Democratic Party as announced then? Because there was a statement made to the country at large that $188,000 was to be saved, and the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on Appropriations now fixes the amount saved at $100,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I did not fix the amount that would be saved. I fixed the amount that, by action so far taken, will be saved annually; and as soon as action is taken upon the resolution which will dispense with 34 useless policemen around the Capitol the work will have been completed. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] may have some influence in another body, not controlled by the majority of this House, perhaps he can accelerate action on a resolution which will help to bring about that happy result.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman says that the policemen are useless. I received a notice the other day from the Sergeant at Arms, telling me to lock my door, because some one has stolen the key that unlocks the doors, and that therefore the policemen all have to be on guard to protect the property of the Members.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That key probably was lost by one of those policemen who expects to lose his job.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I will say that it was lost by the superintendent of the Office Building, who is a Republican, whose office has not been changed. It was taken out of his office.

Mr. MANN. That was because of a lack of policemen to guard it.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Oh, no; that is because of the careless act of a Republican official.

Mr. MANN. It is because of a lot of your inefficient, incompetent policemen whom you have put on new here.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Oh, no; the superintendent is your officer, who is still in charge.

Mr. MANN. You have got any number of new men around here who do not know which way to go in the Capitol to get out or get in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if nobody desires any further information about the bill——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman stated a moment ago that they had saved already $100,000 in the organization of the House. Does the gentleman make that statement seriously?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am quite serious to-day.

Mr. MANN. I challenge the statement, and I would like to have the gentleman produce now or hereafter any proof of that.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I would like to say this, Mr. Speaker, that the record shows that the saving in the month of June over the month of March, when the Republicans were in control, was nearly $9,000.

Mr. MANN. But the month of March had a lot of extra salaries voted.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Oh, no; just on the regular employees.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have compared the statement of the month of March and the subsequent statement.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. We have also.

Mr. MANN. I will be very glad to compare it with the gentleman, and I dare say I can pick his figures to pieces.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. The gentleman may be able to on some technicality, but on the actual figures that is the showing as it comes from the different departments of the Capitol.

Mr. MANN. But I got the figures from the disbursing clerk of the House, and if they are correctly given to me the gentleman is mistaken, not in his statement of the fact, of course, but in his assumption of the effect of the fact. In the month of March there were extra salaries provided.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not many; just a few.

Mr. MANN. Why, there was a considerable increase, and the gentleman's committee reported in a deficiency appropriation bill carrying a number of bonuses.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Probably some enrolling clerk.

Mr. MANN. They are all on the pay roll in the same way, and the amounts are charged, and I challenge the statement. Let them produce the statement and make a showing that there has been a saving of $100,000 in the organization of the House.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the monthly statement of the employees in the month of March and in the month of June.

Mr. MANN. And I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois at the next meeting of the House have the right to present that to the House and explain it to the House.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. We will print it in the RECORD as soon as it can be made out, where it can be read.

Mr. MANN. I have the statement, and I want to hear the gentleman explain it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent to print a certain statement in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that on next Saturday the gentleman from Illinois have time to make comments on this statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, on page 3, getting back to this deficiency bill, section 8, respecting the appointment of an attorney in the Printing Office, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if the Printing Department has an attorney, or if it is contemplated to appoint a new attorney?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment to which the gentleman refers was eliminated. The House did not agree to it, and the Senate receded. There was an attorney in the Printing Office until the 30th of June, and the last Congress abolished the position. The purpose of this amendment was to reestablish the place, but the House conferees would not yield.

If there be no further information desired, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the question of agreeing to the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PENSION LEGISLATION.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 40 minutes on the present status on pension legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for 40 minutes on the present status of pension legislation. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will not object to that request if it is made on the next committee discharge day. I will object to it on any other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

CAMPAIGN PUBLICITY BILL.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if the Chair will lay before the House the publicity bill (H. R. 2958) with Senate amendments, as I desire to make a statement in relation to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest he can not lay it before the House. The gentleman, as I understand, is going to make a request to have it printed, and to lay it before the House would require action.

The SPEAKER. The best way is for the gentleman from Missouri to ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will do that, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I want to say the bill reported from the Senate this morning contains very important, drastic amendments to the House bill as we passed it; amendments far-reaching in their scope and effect. I am sure it is desirable that Members have a chance to know the details of those amendments before the House takes action on it, and for this and other reasons I think it is not proper to act upon the Senate amendments at the present time. I think I voice the sentiment of gentlemen on both sides of the aisle when I say it is not desirable to take the measure up to-day, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the Speaker's table, and that the House order the bill as amended printed, and that the amendments be properly numbered.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no objection to that request. The amendments are numerous. The bill in question is what is known as the campaign publicity bill. The Senate has adopted a large number of amendments, that have not been printed, and the only way by which any Member can find them is by wading through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD over pages of debate to find what the Senate really did, and it is absolutely essential that the bill shall be printed with the Senate amendments numbered so that they may be intelligently considered and discussed in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the publicity bill, with Senate amendments, be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Printed and each amendment numbered.

The SPEAKER. And that the amendments be properly numbered.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I asked that the amendments might be properly numbered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12109. An act to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1911, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet on Saturday next, July 22, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 20, 1911.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Cairo, Ill., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of the Christian Endeavor Union of the Quarterly Meeting of Friends of Honey Creek, Okla.; of sundry citizens of Santa Clara County, Cal.; and of sundry members of the Christian Endeavor Societies of the Boston Christian Endeavor Union, of Boston, Mass., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Merchants' Association of San Diego, Cal., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the so-called corporation-tax law, permitting corporations to make returns at the end of their fiscal years, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAWFORD:

A bill (S. 3067) for the relief of John B. Geddis; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 3068) granting an increase of pension to Josephine K. Woodson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas:

A bill (S. 3069) to amend section 1 of an act of Congress approved May 20, 1908, the same being chapter 181 of the acts of Congress for the year 1908; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. LORIMER:

A bill (S. 3070) granting a pension to William H. Mayo;

A bill (S. 3071) granting an increase of pension to Louzena C. Burwell; and

A bill (S. 3072) granting an increase of pension to Theron S. Bailey; to the Committee on Pensions.

THE FREE LIST.

Mr. BRISTOW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meats, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSENGER TO THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 106), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,440 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

MESSENGER TO CONFERENCE OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 107), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the conference of the minority of the Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized to appoint an additional messenger at an annual salary of $1,440, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

ASSISTANT MESSENGER TO THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BRIGGS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 108), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Vice President be authorized to appoint for his service an assistant messenger, to be paid at the rate of $1,000 a year out of the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not know that it could be properly called a part of the morning business, but I simply wish to make a little correction of a historical inaccuracy which occurred in debate day before yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A correction in the RECORD can be made appropriately after the morning business.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia to suspend until the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] enters the Chamber. In the meanwhile, if the Senator from Virginia will consent, I will move to take up the reciprocity bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. WATSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WATSON] is necessarily absent temporarily from the Senate.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is engaged on the Lorimer investigating committee. I make this announcement for the day.

I was also requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] on the same committee.

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] has been called from the city on important business. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. THORNTON. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] is absent on departmental business.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the names of the absent Senators be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will call the list of absentees.

The Secretary proceeded to call the list of absent Senators and Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas answered to his name when it was called.

Mr. CRAWFORD (when Mr. GAMBLE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. GAMBLE] is necessarily detained from the Chamber in connection with the committee investigating the charges against Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. KENYON's name was called). I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is necessarily absent in connection with the Lorimer investigating committee.

Mr. TAYLOR (when Mr. LEA's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LEA] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE].

The Secretary concluded calling the names of absent Senators.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. PAYNTER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The following Senators having answered to their names—

Bacon	Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Reed
Borah	Clarke, Ark.	McCumber	Root
Bourne	Crane	McLean	Smoot
Bradley	Crawford	Martin, Va.	Sutherland
Brandegee	Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Swanson
Briggs	Cullom	Nelson	Taylor
Bristow	Curtis	Nixon	Thornton
Brown	Davis	Oliver	Wetmore
Burnham	Gronna	Page	Williams
Burton	Guggenheim	Paynter	Works
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Penrose
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Perkins
Clapp	Jones	Pomerene

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of House bill 4412.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARGE OF PICKETT'S DIVISION AT GETTYSBURG.

Mr. JONES rose.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Washington that I will occupy the floor for only a few moments in order to make a correction in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Day before yesterday, in the discussion of the bill (S. 2925) which was in charge of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] providing for the erection of a monument at the Vicksburg National Military Park in honor of the courage and constancy of the Confederate Navy in the Mississippi River and its tributaries, the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] inadvertently fell into a historical error, which I desire to correct. I would not do so while the Senator from Montana was absent from his seat, except for the fact that I have talked with him and he fully understands that he did inadvertently fall into the error which I desire to correct, and which I told him I would correct at the earliest opportunity. The Senator from Montana said:

> The ordinary school history and magazine article refer to that heroic charge—

Referring to the charge at Gettysburg—> of heroic men as the charge of Pickett's Virginians. Gen. George Pickett was himself a Virginian. But as a matter of cold fact and actual history the majority of the men who constituted Pickett's division that charged across that mile of open ground in the face of 150 Federal cannon and 80,000 rifles were North Carolinians; and as I called the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the record in the bronze book that lay open there, it recurred to me that the majority of those regiments that made for themselves names on the page of history were North Carolina regiments—not that it detracted from the bravery of the Virginians on that occasion, but I merely at this time diverge from what I am about to say to give public utterance to that fact, that the men of my own native State may not be robbed of their part in that heroic struggle.

At the outset, Mr. President, I desire to say that in making the correction which I will now make, I certainly do not intend to detract from the honor due to the North Carolinians who participated in that charge. Mr. President, I feel that no greater honor has ever fallen to the lot of man than the honor which falls to the men who participated in that charge at Gettysburg. No greater honor can be transmitted to posterity than that transmitted by those who participated in that memorable charge to their posterity.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Montana was entirely mistaken when he said that Pickett's division was composed of North Carolina troops. I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from Montana, but my attention was called to them the next day, and I then remembered distinctly that Pickett's division was made up entirely of Virginia troops. There was not a North Carolina regiment in the division. But not meaning to rely on my memory, I sent for the Memoirs of Robert E. Lee, written by a member of his staff, Gen. A. L. Long, and I will ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments while I read a paragraph from that volume. In discussing this charge at Gettysburg, Gen. Long says:

> A deathlike stillness then reigned over the field, and each army remained in breathless expectation of something yet to come still more dreadful. In a few moments the attacking column, consisting of Pickett's division, supported on the left by that of Heth, commanded by Pettigrew, and on the right by Wilcox's brigade of Anderson's division, appeared from behind a ridge, and, sweeping over its crest, descended into the depression that separated the two armies.

The charging column, as stated in that extract, Mr. President, consisted of Pickett's division; and Pickett's division, so far as it participated in that charge, was composed of three brigades. One of his brigades was detached, and did not participate in the charge. The three brigades of Pickett's division, which, under the command of Gen. Pickett, did participate in that charge, were Garnett's brigade, composed of five Virginia regiments—Gen. Garnett himself being a Virginian, commanding that brigade, composed entirely of Virginians, fell that day on the field of battle—the Second Brigade, under the command of Gen. Pickett on that occasion, was Armisted's brigade, known as the Second Brigade, and composed of five Virginia regiments. There was not a North Carolina regiment in it. Armisted fell dead on the field of battle. He also was a Virginian. The Third Brigade in Pickett's division, participating in that charge, was Kemper's brigade, known as the Third Brigade, composed also of five Virginia regiments, with not a North Carolinian in the brigade. Kemper himself was thought to be mortally wounded. He lost a leg, but did recover. Those were the three brigades of Pickett's division—and the only brigades or regiments of Pickett's division—which participated in that charge. They were all Virginians and commanded by Virginians.

It is true, Mr. President, that North Carolina was present with troops, who immortalized themselves, as did the Virginians, on that memorable day. To the left of Pickett in that charge was the division of Maj. Gen. Heth, but commanded on that occasion by Gen. Pettigrew, of North Carolina. This division, commanded by Gen. Pettigrew, was composed also of three brigades. One of the brigades was commanded—I am not sure as to who commanded that brigade; it is unnecessary to give the name of the commander on that occasion; and I hestitate to do so, as I am not very certain—but the First Brigade in Pettigrew's division was composed of five regiments of North Carolina troops.

The Second Brigade was composed of four regiments entirely of Virginia troops, and the Third Brigade was composed of two regiments of Alabama troops and three regiments of Tennessee troops. So the division commanded by Gen. Pettigrew, which occupied the field to the left of Gen. Pickett on that occasion, was composed of three brigades, one composed entirely of North Carolina troops, one entirely of Virginia troops, and one partly of Alabama and partly of Tennessee troops.

I mention them all, because there was honor enough on the field of Gettysburg for all the States and for the troops of all the States. I want to mention all who participated in that charge, and let it be known that Alabama and Tennessee, as well as Virginia and North Carolina, shared the honors which were won to the left of Pickett on that day by the division commanded by Gen. Pettigrew.

To the right of Gen. Pickett the field was occupied by one brigade under the command of Gen. Wilcox. That brigade under Gen. Wilcox, to the right of Gen. Pickett, was composed of five regiments, entirely Alabama troops. Those commands coming from those States and making in the aggregate 15,000 men, were those who constituted the assaulting column on the third day at Gettysburg, where, I say, such courage, such devotion, and such persistency were manifested as to make the performance of those southern troops on that day memorable in the annals of history, never having been surpassed, and never, in my judgment, to be surpassed in the future wars which may hereafter afflict our country.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am sorry I did not get into the Chamber in time to hear the statement of the Senator from Virginia, and I want to ask him at this time what is his final conclusion regarding the Virginia and the North Carolina troops who participated in the so-called Pickett charge at Gettysburg?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am also sorry that the Senator from Montana was not present; but I thought he and I understood the matter so thoroughly after my conversation with him, and being sure that he realized that he had inadvertently fallen into a historical error, that I have been led to proceed, expecting him to come in every moment, and did not await his arrival. I am, however, very glad to briefly repeat in his presence what I said in his absence, that there was not a North Carolina regiment in Pickett's division; and I read from the book of Gen. A. L. Long, who was on Gen. Robert E. Lee's staff, which gave the personnel of the assaulting column; and Gen. Long in that book states that Pickett's division on that day was composed of three brigades, one commanded by Garnett, who fell on the field of battle, composed entirely of Virginians; another commanded by Armisted, composed entirely of Virginians, and Armisted fell dead on the field of battle; and another commanded by Gen. Kemper, also entirely composed of Virginians. Kemper was not killed, but he was seriously wounded. He lost a leg and was badly mutilated on that occasion. So that in Pickett's division there was not a North Carolina regiment. One of Pickett's brigades was detached and did not engage in the battle on that occasion.

But, Mr. President, it was purely a mistake as to the membership of the troops which composed Pickett's division. In Pettigrew's division, which was to the left of Pickett, one of his brigades was composed entirely of North Carolinians, and they won honors second to none ever won on the field of battle by the troops of any State in any age or in any period of the history of the world.

In what I have had to say I did not desire to, and I would not for my right arm, detract one iota from the honor that is due them, but in the interest of the truth of history I desire it to appear in the RECORD that Pickett's division was not composed of North Carolinians; but Pettigrew's division, or Heth's division, commanded on that day by Pettigrew, was composed of three brigades, one composed entirely of North Carolinians, another composed entirely of Virginians, and another composed of Tennesseeans and Alabamians. Those three brigades were under the command of Pettigrew, and all won honors which, I say, have never been surpassed, if they have been equaled, in the history of the wars of the world.

I think that covers the point which I undertook to correct; in correcting which I desire not only to do justice, but to pay fitting tribute to the troops of North Carolina, together with the troops of Virginia, Alabama, and Tennessee.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I know the distinguished Senator from Virginia, who himself was a soldier in that war, would not intentionally do any wrong to the history of North Carolina troops at Gettysburg, but in the remark that I made the other day, purely from a desire that the soldiers of my own native State should have their proper recognition in that great drama of the Civil War and to attempt to correct much misinformation regarding the matter, I did say that in school textbooks, in the magazines, and in the newspapers the popular impression created as to Pickett's charge at Gettysburg, or the charge of "Pickett's Virginians," as it is usually called, was misleading. At that time I used the words "Pickett's division." The Senator from Virginia is right. As a matter of fact, Pickett only commanded the right wing of the assaulting column; Gen. Pettigrew, of North Carolina, commanded the other. As a matter of history, reenforced by the inscription in the "big bronze book," the monument which marks "high tide at Gettysburg," where the Confederate charge broke through the Union lines, the fact is recorded that in the assaulting column there were 15 regiments of Virginia troops and 16 regiments of North Carolina troops.

The Senator from Virginia overlooked one fact in his statement that I want to correct. In recounting the troops composing Pettigrew's division he only gives the North Carolinians credit for one brigade. In Heth's old division, then commanded by Pettigrew, one brigade only was North Carolina troops with one additional regiment of North Carolina troops attached to another brigade. But in Trimble's division, which was the supporting line to Pettigrew's division, were Scales's brigade of North Carolina troops, composed of 5 regiments, and Lane's brigade of North Carolina troops, composed of 5 regiments, making 16 North Carolina regiments in all. The other two brigades of Trimble's division did not participate in the assault.

The statement of the Senator from Virginia would have it appear that only 5 North Carolina regiments participated in the assault. In Pettigrew's division, which was Pender's old division, there were 5 North Carolina regiments, but in Scales's brigade and in Lane's brigade were 10 additional North Carolina regiments. Of the 23 regiments composing Pettigrew's command, 16 of them were North Carolina regiments, as against 15 Virginia regiments—constituting Pickett's division.

But since the discussion arose, a day or so ago, in further proof of what I said—that the historical truth has been distorted and credit almost universally given to the charge of "Pickett's Virginians"—I sent yesterday for the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, just off the press, to see what it said about it and to learn whether or not any correction of the popular error had been made. I read from the Encyclopedia Britannica a section which is totally misleading, so far as the truth is concerned. It says:

> The charge of Pickett's division is one of the most famous episodes of military history. In the teeth of an appalling fire from the rifles of the defending infantry, who were well sheltered, and from the guns which Hunt had reserved for the crisis, the Virginia regiments pressed on and with a final effort broke Meade's first line. * * * One regiment lost 90 per cent of its numbers.

Not a word here in the Encyclopedia Britannica about the other regiments from other States that participated in that historic assault.

The erroneous statement leaves the reader under the impression that only Virginia soldiers participated.

It was not one of Pickett's regiments that "lost 90 per cent of its numbers," as stated in this encyclopedia, but the Twenty-sixth North Carolina Regiment that is undoubtedly referred to.

The whole trend of that story is that it was "Pickett's Virginians" alone who made this great assault at Gettysburg. I sent to the Library and got volume 3 of Battles and Leaders of the Civil War, which gives Longstreet's account of it. Longstreet, who under Lee's order was in direct command of the charge, in his official report says:

> As the commands reported, Pickett was assigned on the right, Kemper's and Garnett's brigades to be supported by Armisted's, Wilcox's brigade of the Third Corps en échelon and guarding Pickett's right—

Wilcox's brigade was an Alabama brigade exclusively—

> Two brigades of Pender's division, Scales and Lane, under command of Gen. Trimble. The brigades of Pettigrew's division were Archer's, Pettigrew's, Brockenbrough's—

Which was an Alabama brigade—and Davis's.

That portion of Pickett's division present were all Virginians. Wilcox's 5 regiments were all Alabamians. Pettigrew's column on the left comprised 4 brigades. It comprised 6 North Carolina regiments, 3 Tennesseean, 3 Mississippian, and 1 Alabamian, or 13 in all. Pettigrew's 2 supporting brigades, comprised of 10 regiments, all of which were North Carolinians. So that of Pettigrew's column 16 of his 23 regiments hailed from the old North State.

The mistake that is most frequently made lies in this fact: Pickett's division had not participated in the battle until that day. They had been left back on the Chambersburg Pike as the rear guard. A portion of Pickett's division did not participate at all in the assault. Longstreet, in his report, gives the number of men engaged at about 15,000 and gives the strength of Pickett's division as 4,900. The last official return of which we have record, made by Pickett on June 20, 1863, previous to the battle of Gettysburg, showed Pickett's division numbered 6,114 men present and fit for duty, but a part of the 6,114 men had been left back on the Chambersburg Pike.

I want to take no credit from any man. The Virginians under Pickett did more than mortal men could be expected to do; but I do want it to appear, so that the world may know, that the majority of the men who went up Cemetery Ridge on the afternoon of July 3, 1863, in the face of that murderous fire of shot and shell from Meade's intrenched line of infantry and artillery, were North Carolinians, and that they bore the brunt of that historic assault. The Twenty-sixth North Carolina Regiment was partially recruited from my own county, and in that assault and in the first day's fighting, on July 1, lost the greatest percentage in killed and wounded of any regiment of either the Federal or the Confederate Armies. I have here on my desk a book from the Congressional Library, entitled "Regimental Losses in the American Civil War," which gives the loss of the Twenty-sixth North Carolina Regiment as 88 per cent in the total casualties.

The regiment mustered 800 men when the battle began on July 1. After the roll had been called at nightfall of that terrible first day's struggle, 584 were numbered among the dead, wounded, and captured. Of the remaining 216 who responded "here" at the end of the first day's fighting and who again sprang forward on that afternoon of July 3 at the word of command, 130 never returned.

Just 86 of that heroic regiment of heroic North Carolinians shouldered their muskets and with heavy hearts took up the line of retreat to the sheltering banks of the Potomac. The story of the "Light Brigade" and its sacrifice at Balaklava pales besides the story of the Twenty-sixth North Carolina at Gettysburg.

I speak without any feeling except of pure kindness for my Virginia friends. It is true that, as shown by the official annals of the Civil War, Virginians, for some reason or other, held most of the important commands. It may hardly be the proper thing for me to say the North Carolinians did most of the fighting, but I can not now resist the temptation to quote from this book, "Deaths in the Confederate Armies." It is compiled from the official returns of the Confederate Army, but the author states that some of the returns are missing. According to this tabulation, during the entire Civil War period, Virginia lost in killed 5,338; died of wounds, 2,519; died of disease, 6,947, making a total of 14,794. In that same conflict the North Carolina troops lost in killed in battle 14,522; died of wounds, 5,151; died of disease, 20,061, or a total of 40,275. In other words, North Carolina gave nearly three times the numbers that Virginia gave to the list of Confederate "dead," "died of wounds," and "died of disease."

For the sake of historical truth let the cold record be preserved.

It is historically true that the North Carolina soldiers "were first at Bethel, last at Appomattox, and farthest at Gettysburg."

Mr. JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Just one word, if the Senator from Washington will excuse me.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to add to what I have stated simply this: In reading the list of brigades that were with Gen. Pettigrew through inadvertence I omitted the Fourth Brigade. While we are mentioning those brigades which were in the charging column it is not proper to omit that brigade, commanded by Gen. Joseph R. Davis and composed of three regiments of Mississippi troops and one regiment of North Carolina troops. I simply desire to correct a historical inaccuracy which the Senator from Montana made, and perhaps made through inadvertence, with the idea which he seems to have, and which I have no doubt he verily believes, and I will not engage in any discussion with him about it this morning, that North Carolinians, as he has stated, did most of the fighting during the Civil War.

I do not think it would be promotive of any good result for a discussion to be carried on between the Senator from Montana and myself as to who was first at Bethel, farthest at Gettysburg, and last at Appomattox. I will say that North Carolina did her full duty, and I would not pluck one honor from her for my right hand. I say, I will not engage in any discussion on the subject, because when the Senator from Montana has stated what he has said, winding up with the words I have just quoted, and previously having stated that most of the fighting was done by the troops of North Carolina, it would be entirely useless for us to engage in any discussion. I will simply award to North Carolina the highest honor I can bestow upon her by the words spoken by me here to-day.

THE STANDARD OIL AND AMERICAN TOBACCO COS.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. On yesterday I gave notice that to-day, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I would call up Senate concurrent resolution No. 4.

I had known before, but did not at the time appreciate the fact, that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] had given notice that they would discuss the reciprocity measure this morning. As notices have been given of certain speeches to-morrow and, as we understand that the unanimous-consent agreement as to the reciprocity measure prevails for Saturday, I desire to give notice that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I will call up this resolution.

RETURN OF EXPORTED ARTICLES.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12312) to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend paragraph 500 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," so as to read as follows:

500. Articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, when returned after having been exported, without having been advanced in value or improved in condition by any process of manufacture or other means; casks, barrels, carboys, bags, and other containers or coverings of American manufacture exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, including shooks and staves when returned as barrels or boxes; also quicksilver flasks or bottles, iron or steel drums used for the shipment of acids, of either domestic or foreign manufacture, which shall have been actually exported from the United States; but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made, under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the exemption of bags from duty shall apply only to such domestic bags as may be imported by the exporter thereof, and if any such articles are subject to internal-revenue tax at the time of exportation, such tax shall be proved to have been paid before exportation and not refunded; photographic dry plates or films of American manufacture (except moving-picture films), exposed abroad, whether developed or not, and films from moving-picture machines, light struck or otherwise damaged, or worn out, so as to be unsuitable for any other purpose than the recovery of the constituent materials, provided the basic films are of American manufacture, but proof of the identity of such articles shall be made under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any article upon which an allowance of drawback has been made, the reimportation of which is hereby prohibited except upon payment of duties equal to the drawbacks allowed; or to any article manufactured in bonded warehouse and exported under any provision of law: And provided further, That when manufactured tobacco which has been exported without payment of internal-revenue tax shall be reimported it shall be retained in the custody of the collector of customs until internal-revenue stamps in payment of the legal duties shall be placed thereon: And provided further, That cattle, horses, sheep, and other domestic animals straying across the boundary line into any foreign country or driven across such boundary line by the owners for temporary pasturage purposes only, together with their offspring, shall be dutiable, unless brought back to the United States within six months, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 492.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it has become the habit of our Democratic friends to denounce tariff measures prepared by Republicans as being formulated under sinister influences and for the benefit of "special interests," and especially for the benefit of the so-called trusts. Of late years some of our Republican friends have contracted this same habit, and they do not see any good in tariff legislation not framed in entire accord with their views. They now charge that this legislation was formulated in secret and in connivance with the representatives of large interests, and they declare that it will benefit only certain big trusts and has been framed solely in their interests. Such a charge is wholly without foundation and is unjust and unfair.

The agreement upon which this legislation is based was negotiated in secret by the representatives, not of special interests, but of the two Governments, as all international negotiations must be conducted. No one representing the so-called special interests was called in or participated in preparing this agreement. It is presented with the patriotic purpose of benefiting all the people of the United States and in the hope that it will make the farmer more prosperous, furnish more work and better wages to the laborer, more business to the commercial interests of the country, and add to the happiness and prosperity of our people as a whole; and it is presented with the further hope that it will promote perpetual peace and good will between the countries affected. It is not proposed for the particular benefit of any trust, and it will not result in any special benefit to any particular trust. It is an insult to the intelligence and the good sense of the people of this country to attempt to make them believe that the President of the United States and those acting for him have in this legislation presented "a tariff trade conceived in special-interest selfishness." The President of the United States may make mistakes, but no man ever discharged the duties of that high office with loftier motives or more patriotic purposes than President Taft.

Mr. President, this legislation is not all I would desire, and I never expect to see presented any measure affecting the tariff to any considerable extent that will satisfy everyone; but I am for it because as a whole I am convinced it is good legislation and will promote the interests of the people. If I thought it to be unjust and unfair to any great industry, class of our people, or to any particular section of the country, I would vote against it, but I do not question the motives and purposes of those who oppose it. I am not for it because it may be an entering wedge to further reductions in tariff rates, although further reductions can be made with safety to our industries. The declarations of many of our Democratic friends that this measure is Democratic doctrine, that it is the beginning of the end of protection, that it is a step in that direction, have caused me no little hesitation. I have convinced myself that the only respect in which this legislation agrees with Democratic beliefs is that it will benefit the country, and on that basis we can all unite, for it is that which actuates all of us in the last analysis. It is not in accordance with the Democratic doctrine of a tariff for revenue only. It is not obnoxious to the principles of protection under which we have made such wonderful progress and had such unexampled prosperity.

This is not a tariff bill in the ordinary sense and is not to be judged solely by tariff principles or declarations. Tariff revision, whether general or by schedule, affects the tariff upon articles imported into this country from all the rest of the world. The revision of the wool schedule is a revision of the tariff upon the importation of wool from all the countries of the world. The free-list bill, so called, is a revision of the tariff on the products from every people and from every country on the face of the earth. This legislation, however, affects no products except those passing between the United States and Canada. The duty on similar articles coming from other countries is untouched. Nor does it simply affect the duties on articles coming into this country from Canada, but it also affects the duties on articles going into that country from this. In my judgment, the principle of protection is not involved in this legislation at all, nor does it affect the principle of a tariff for revenue only. It is not revenue legislation, it is not protective tariff legislation, but it is a proposition to carry out a tentative agreement made between the two countries and deemed to be advantageous to both. I am convinced, however, that it does not in any respect violate the declaration in the last Republican platform that the tariff to be imposed on products coming into this country shall be sufficient only to cover the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad.

My own opinion is that that declaration can not be properly and fully carried out except by proceeding to deal with the tariff upon products of each particular country very much as we have done in this case. The difference between the cost of production in the United States and Germany is not the same as between the United States and England, and that which would measure the difference between the cost of production in the United States and France would not measure the difference between the cost of production in China or Japan or India and in this country; and the only way that that declaration can be literally carried out is to enact legislation covering the difference in cost between the United States and each particular country.

Objection is made to this legislation on the ground that it does not go far enough. I wish myself we could have gone further. We could have done so with perfect safety to our industries, but Canada would go no further; and it was not necessary and probably would have been unwise to make concessions to Canada greater than she asked. The President has clearly stated that our representatives offered free trade to Canada in her products in consideration of free trade in our products. Canada did not feel that she could safely go so far, and the President has gone just as far as possible in the direction of free trade with Canada without giving concessions which would be of no advantage to us but which might result in positive injury if unaccompanied by similar concessions from Canada. If further reductions in the tariff should be made in the interests of our own people and independent of any consideration from Canada, such reductions should be made in a separate measure, with the full knowledge and understanding that they are made upon the articles affected as coming from all the world. The amendments proposed by the senior Senator from Iowa appealed to me, confined by their terms, as they were, to Canada, if I had been sure they would go no further. I was not sure of this, and so I voted against them.

This legislation is proposed to carry into effect the agreement reached by the representatives of the two countries. At the outset is made the objection that is always urged by some one against every important measure proposed. No measure of importance has been passed, and no progressive steps have been taken in the history of our country except over the shattered fragments of the Constitution. So now the Constitution has been outraged and violated. It is charged that the President had no authority to negotiate this agreement and that it is a violation of the Constitution to enact it. I believe that this contention will go the way of all similar contentions heretofore made, and after this legislation is passed and the beneficent results that will come from it have become a part of our wealth and development, the Constitution will be found to be exactly the same as it was before this legislation was proposed.

The President can carry on negotiations with other nations. He has the power, and it has been exercised without question time and again, to make tentative agreements with them, and submit such tentative agreements to Congress for appropriate legislation. If such agreements take the shape of formal treaties not affecting the revenues, he very properly may submit them to the Senate alone for ratification. If such agreements affect the revenue, I think it entirely proper, if not absolutely necessary, for him to submit the same to Congress for appropriate legislation originating in the House of Representatives, the body vested with the power of originating legislation under the Constitution itself. This, of course, has been followed in this case; and, instead of the Constitution being violated, it has been complied with and respected in every particular. The weakness of our position often leads us to put the Constitution in the way of legislation to which we are opposed. It has seemed to me that the Constitution is frequently the refuge of those without reason to support their contention.

It also is urged that Congress is deprived of its legislative function and that the President is usurping its powers and prerogatives. That is not so. The President has sent his message to us in the constitutional way. We can adopt or reject the proposed legislation, just as we see fit, and whatever action is taken by Congress will be our action and not that of the President. But it is said we are deprived of the right to amend this proposed legislation. Not so. We can amend it as we see fit. We are told, however, that any amendments will likely defeat the legislation. This is simply the statement of a fact that every man knows who is at all familiar with the situation. Differences between the House and Senate can be adjusted by conference committees; differences between countries can not. If we had a conference committee between the Canadian Parliament and Congress to which our differences could be referred and adjusted, then it would be entirely safe and proper to amend this bill; but there is no such committee. This legislation embodies just what the representatives of the two countries could and did agree to, and it is for us to accept or reject it, as we may deem wise in our legislative capacity; and the contention that anyone is usurping our functions is simply beclouding the issue. I shall vote for this legislation because I believe it to be good legislation. I shall vote against its amendment because amendments, in my judgment, would defeat it and accomplish nothing.

I will say this, if an amendment embodying a reasonable revision of the wool schedule, or other schedules, along protective lines could be agreed to and presented by the Republicans, I would feel justified in voting for such an amendment, as I would vote for such reasonable revision of schedules along protective lines if presented in a separate measure; and if an amendment should be presented by any Republican revising any schedule or schedules of the tariff in a reasonable way and along protective lines which would not effect this agreement on the part of Canada, but which would present such a revision as would be beneficial to our people in their dealings with all the world, I shall feel free to vote for such amendment, although I would prefer to have the same presented in a separate measure. I would like to see the Republicans sink their differences and by mutual concessions present as an amendment to this bill, or as an amendment to one of the revenue bills sent to this body by the House of Representatives, such a revision of the leading schedules of our tariff law as would meet the reasonable demands of the people.

I voted for the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act. I have no apology to make for that vote. That bill contained many provisions of a progressive character. It was superior in many respects to the Dingley law. It made many important reductions in the tariff, and was, in fact, very largely responsive to the demands of the country in regard to tariff revision. It has been widely denounced and misrepresented; but, despite all these denunciations, the country has prospered under it. Industries have moved forward and labor has been employed steadily at good wages. The farmers' products have had a good market and commanded higher prices than ever before, and revenues have been collected to meet the enormous expenses of the Government. Our import trade has been increased and our export trade has expanded as never before, and, if political agitation could stop for just a short while, the country would be amazed at its progress, prosperity, and development.

The people, however, are not satisfied with this law. They will not be satisfied until some further changes are made, and I believe the sooner this demand for these changes is met the better it will be for the country. I, therefore, am in favor of revising several of the schedules of the present tariff law and of doing it now. This is the best course to take. It is best for the people and the country, and that which is best for the people and the country is best for the Republican Party.

The junior Senator from Mississippi the other day gave us some good advice, and at the same time took a broad, patriotic position. He offered, and I believe he spoke for more than himself, to accept and vote for reasonable reductions offered by us, even if not framed on Democratic lines. If we are wise we will take advantage of the present situation. While we are talking here our Finance Committee could prepare and present a bill that would meet the demands of the people, irrespective of party, bring stability to business, and end tariff legislation of any consequence for years to come. We could pass it with less talk and less delay than we will have on this measure, and if such a measure were brought in talk for or against this reciprocity measure would cease. The legislation would be passed and the country would take a long breath and start upon a period of prosperity as wonderful and remarkable as that of the last 10 years.

I saw a few days ago that my friend the senior Senator from Utah declared that the country wanted a rest; that business interests wanted a rest from tariff legislation; and that what we ought to do was to vote on this measure and go home. I want to go home; the country wants to have a rest; business interests should have a rest; and that is what my suggestion would bring. The country will have no rest and business interests will have no rest from tariff agitation, however, until several of the schedules of the present tariff act are further revised, and the sooner this revision is made the sooner rest will come and agitation cease. The man who does not recognize this is, in my judgment, blind to the political situation and conditions in this country. If we adjourn without revising these schedules the agitation will go on. In two or three months Congress will meet again and the whole tariff legislation will proceed. In fact that is exactly what my friend the Senator from Utah promises the country. He says by December we will have reports from the Tariff Board, and then promises to take up these schedules. So that legislation will drag along through the next session; business uncertainty, if not business stagnation, will pervade the country; a political campaign will come on and be fought out with the tariff as the issue, and the man who can see rest for business, rest for the country in the prospects for the future and the course that it seems determined to follow can see rainbows at midnight.

While the country believes in protection, it also believes that substantial reductions should be made in several of the schedules along protection lines. We will have to stay here a month or two anyway, and we can not engage in more patriotic work than to set aside our party differences and proceed to meet the sentiment of the country for the revision of these schedules. We have the information at hand. Our Finance Committee has the information; and, by mutual concessions and a patriotic regard for the public good, a bill could be brought in here, passed through the Senate, the differences between the House and Senate satisfactorily adjusted, and a Republican President, in my judgment, would not fail to sign the measure.

The Senator from Wisconsin suggested the other day that we can make reductions in some of these schedules and yet make allowance for the variations and differences between the cost of labor at home and abroad, so that when the Tariff Board submits its report any inequalities that may exist can be remedied. He is correct; and I want to suggest to those who ask us to wait for reports from the Tariff Board that that board may not be in existence very long. It may not have an opportunity to investigate and report upon many of these schedules, and we will have to act on some of them without the information it might secure. With the opposition of our Democratic friends to the Tariff Board, and their view that the same is an expensive luxury, we must expect that the appropriations for this board will cease the 1st of next July. I also want to suggest to my Republican friends who are in favor of a revision of the tariff schedule by schedule, and yet declare their allegiance to the Republican doctrine of protection, that when we start to revise the tariff schedule by schedule it means the end of the protective system. The Democrats will vote solidly in the revision of any schedule for revenue duties, and those Republicans who have all the protection taken from their industries will be enough to vote away protective duties in any other schedule, and the more schedules revised schedule by schedule the fewer friends protection will have for the schedules that remain.

This is illustrated by the present situation on the bill now pending. We hear almost every day statements made on this floor that if protection is taken away from the products of certain States they will see to it that protection is taken away from the products of other States; and, while I do not believe there is any justification for such a contention in regard to the present bill, there will be much justification for it if we take up a schedule of the tariff and revise it as affecting our intercourse with all countries of the world, and, by force of numbers, take away protection from the products of a particular locality without special regard for the effect that it may have upon that locality.

Mr. President, while I am a protectionist and believe that that policy best promotes the general welfare of the people, I am getting a little bit tired, not to say disgusted, with the everlasting contention that our people can not in any line of endeavor, nor under any circumstances whatever, compete or hold their own with anyone in any kind of work anywhere or at any time, except, possibly, on the Fourth of July. Whether we face the poor, weak, and inefficient labor of Europe; the ignorant, unskilled, lazy, shiftless anemics of the Tropics; or the vigorous but scant numbers of the north, we shiver, shake, and proclaim our helplessness in a business way when any suggestion is made of reducing the tariff. Tropic climes and frigid lands alike affright us. Present development frightens us no more than dim and misty prospects of the future. I have heard so much of this during the last three years that it has begun to grate on my nerves as well as on my tariff beliefs. I am constrained to take a lantern, like Diogenes, and see if I can not find at least one man or one industry that could stand a little reduction of the tariff without resulting in the destruction of that man's business or that industry. None such have appeared here during the consideration of the tariff measures in the last three years. I sometimes wonder if the application of our protective-tariff principle takes away all of our business courage and confidence. I do know that this apparent greed and grasping spirit which is perverting the application of what I believe to be a beneficent principle threatens the overthrow of the whole fabric.

As I said before, this bill does not affect the tariff on anything coming from any country except Canada, and to determine its effect and relation to the principles of the protective tariff we must keep in mind actual conditions in Canada as compared with this country. When our forefathers passed the first protective measure it was to protect our thinly settled frontier country and our new and struggling infant industries from old and thickly settled countries with long-established and highly developed industries. Under this system our population has increased thirtyfold, our industries have grown beyond the wildest dream, and our products and manufactures go into all the marts of the world. The only basis for protection now, I believe, is solely the condition of labor. There is no country now contiguous to us where labor is so well paid, well housed, and well fed as in this country, nor where it works under such favorable conditions as here. I do not want to do anything to lower these conditions, and I believe that in adjusting our tariff we should so adjust it as to make due allowances for the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad as measured by the difference in the labor cost. When we have done that the genius, intelligence, and energy of our citizens will hold its own with the world. Our Democratic friends declared substantially for this policy a few years ago; and if they had stood by that declaration there would have been no practical difference between the two parties on the tariff question to-day. It would not be a party issue, and it could be settled and adjusted in a businesslike way, as it ought to be.

The arguments that favored the protective-tariff system when it was inaugurated in this country do not at all apply as between this country and Canada except on the side of the Canadians. That is a new and undeveloped country as compared with ours. Its population is less than one-tenth of ours and its industries are indeed infants compared with ours. In agriculture, manufacturing, and transportation there is no comparison, and the necessity for the application of the protective system between us from our standpoint as appeared to the founders of the Republic does not apply. Nor can there be any basis for protection against them on account of the cheapness or overabundance of their labor. Their territory is contiguous to us along 3,000 miles of our border. It is, in fact, simply a continuation of our own country, and whatever differences there may be physically and climatically are to their disadvantage and our advantage. They are more restricted in their crops, and their climate is more rigorous and uncertain in its effects than ours; and the farther it gets away from our territory the more uncertain and restricted become their crops. Its people are the same as ours, with the same needs, desires, hopes, ambitions, and aspirations, and the same mode and standard of living. They are hardy, active, energetic, and self-reliant, and worthy and equal competitors with us in the battle of life; a people with whom a contest is elevating and not degrading. In fact, they are, and every year are becoming more, our own people; bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. Their labor of all kinds is as high classed and high priced as our own, and the legitimate cost of production is as great, if not greater, than ours, and upon no proper theory can a protective tariff against them be justified. In fact, when we consider the difficulties of the soil and climate they must face and their insignificant development as compared to our own we should feel humiliated at the suggestion that we need protection from them.

There are those who oppose this legislation and urge as an argument against it that it is not in accordance with our ancient ideas of reciprocity nor with past declarations of Republican platforms. This is rank "standpattism." This is taking a position with the "reactionaries." We can not progress by adhering too closely to declarations made and opinions held heretofore upon conditions which have materially changed. The application of governmental principles must change with changed conditions, even if principles do not change. Most of the declarations in party platforms and opinions of former statesmen in favor of reciprocity in noncompetitive products only were made and held largely having in view the conditions in tropical climes and with tropical peoples living upon a much lower plane in every respect from our own. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] met this objection very fully, and showed conclusively that reciprocity in competitive products is not contrary to the views held by Republican leaders, and is clearly in accordance with legislation and treaties proposed by the leaders of the party who have indorsed the general party declarations. We must treat Canada differently. There could be no reciprocity with Canada except in competitive products, because she can not produce anything that we do not produce.

Canada's location, climate, productions, and people are so different from that of any other country that the application of any tariff policy toward her must be entirely different from the one adopted toward other countries. The junior Senator from Minnesota on May 24, 1909, expressed very forcefully and clearly the basis upon which we should treat Canada, and, in my judgment, epitomized the argument in favor of this legislation from almost every standpoint. He said:

> Along this Canadian border, with nothing but an imaginary line to cross, it is idle, in my judgment, and idle, in my experience and observation, to talk about any great difference in wages on one side or the other. When a man by a day's walk can go from the mill on that side to a mill on this side, from a field on that to a field on this side, that imaginary international boundary line will not maintain any very different scale of wages long upon one side or upon the other. And they are the same class of men. When we talk about a protective tariff and think of the overcrowded countries of Europe, of the cheap wage scale of Europe, when we realize that the wage earner in Europe must and oftentimes has to borrow and incur a great expense to come to this country, there may be wisdom in attempting to maintain an artificial wall between this country and ours. But when we look to sparsely settled Canada, when we look to a class of men enjoying a wage scale practically the equivalent of our own wage scale, it seems to me that sooner or later the American people have got to recognize the impossibility of forever maintaining an artificial wall where there is no natural reason for the establishment or maintenance of that wall. Sooner or later, Mr. President, we shall have to recognize on a broader plane this natural relation to Canada. I predict here in the Senate to-day that the time will come when even with a protective policy as firmly implanted as it is to-day in our general policy, yet in our tariff relation to Canada we will recognize that it must be limited largely to the basis on revenue as required by that country and this.

The Senator from Iowa, Mr. CUMMINS, in an interview found in the Columbian of May, 1911, expressed substantially the same idea, as follows:

I believe it is wise to deal with Canada in an agreement separate from our agreements with other nations of the world—for many reasons, chief of which, of course, is that in several important details we are really one country. Geographically but an imaginary line divides us, for the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence really are links and not dividing barriers. We should, I am convinced, have a tariff agreement with the Dominion drawn quite independently of our agreements with all other nations and modeled in a way to fit the special details of the situation. It seems to me that this is obvious, and the really surprising thing is that it was not so arranged long, long ago. The conditions governing production in almost every line, but particularly in agriculture, are so nearly identical in Canada and the United States that the rules which we apply, and rightly, to products of other nations which compete with our own products should not apply between us and the Dominion.

Said he—

Conditions in this country have also changed very materially with the wonderful development that has taken place during the last 15 or 20 years. Then there were millions of acres of public lands suitable for homesteaders; it is different now. The frontier is gone. Desirable public lands are no more, and the man trying to comply with the law to secure title to lands, such as they are, is hounded and spied upon as a criminal. The eyes of our landless are turned to the northward, and thousands of our good citizens are going to the northland, seeking homes and prosperity. We should not and will not apply to them the same legislative principles that we would apply to noncontiguous countries and alien people. They may live under another flag, but they are our own people. Trade and intercourse will benefit us and them, and no declarations of the past will prevent me from voting to hold our friends and neighbors to the north with us in trade, spirit, and ultimate destiny.

This legislation is opposed because Canadian statesmen approve it. Some Canadian statesmen do approve it, because they believe it would be beneficial to their interests, and therefore it is argued that we should not pass it. There are statesmen in Canada who favor this arrangement very heartily and who see great good to Canada from its passage; but, on the other hand, there are many who denounce it just as vigorously as it is denounced here, and who predict all sorts of disasters to Canada and her interests if it is passed.

If the fact that Canadian statesmen approve the bill is an argument against its passage here, then the fact that Canadian statesmen oppose it should be an argument in favor of its passage by us, and in that case the balance of the argument would be decidedly in favor of the legislation. The majority for the legislation in the Canadian Parliament will be much smaller than in the American Congress. The majority for the legislation in the Canadian Parliament is generally estimated at not more than 40, while the majority for it in our Congress will be much greater. Some Canadian statesmen see great benefit in this legislation for Canada, and statements by them are quoted to us as conclusive on the matter. There are many others, however, who are equally confident, and I think with much more reason, that it will be injurious to Canada; and some of their statesmen are making an active, earnest, and open campaign before the people against it. They are holding public meetings in all parts of the country and seem to be confident of convincing the people of Canada that they should not pass it.

Hon. R. P. Roblin, premier of Manitoba, in Toronto, April 19, 1911, is quoted as follows:

Speaking generally, the opponents of the reciprocity pact in Manitoba have made no effort to counteract the strenuous exertions of those who seemingly have been inspired to action in its favor, for the reason that many doubt that it will ever be carried into effect. There are a good many who are advising no action on the Government, and that, if it ever goes into operation, it will be such a disappointment, such a costly experiment to the poor unfortunates who have been misled and deceived, that the Laurier government will be so easy that there will hardly be a contest at all. That view of the case is held, I may say, by men who believe that the Laurier government should be overthrown on its general administration, but who are satisfied that with the reciprocity pact in effect the overthrow would be assured.

My own opinion is that reciprocity will divide Canada into an east and west; it will produce a condition of things that will destroy the work that has been prosecuted toward binding the scattered Provinces together in interprovincial trade ever since confederation.

After pointing out that reciprocity would mean the certain wrecking of mixed farming in Manitoba, where this business is just beginning to be developed, Mr. Roblin went on:

I make the statement that reciprocity will not only not benefit the people of Manitoba, but that it will work most serious injury and financial loss, with more certainty and conviction than any statement I have ever made on any other public question. I can not undertake even to estimate—it is too serious to do so—its final effect upon confederation and upon our relations with the motherland.

Our friends from the adjoining States could not use much stronger language than this against the legislation.

Sir George W. Ross, one of Canada's leading statesmen, in a speech opposing reciprocity, quoted at length in Industrial Canada of November 10, 1910, discusses the effect of this agreement fully, and his reasoning seems to me to be unanswerable and his conclusions inevitable. He says:

A POOR BARGAIN.

But, assuming that bona fide proposals for reciprocity are to be submitted, let me mention a few considerations that require the most careful attention.

We must not forget that the mere exchange of certain articles may involve a great deal more than appears on the surface. For example, to abolish the duty on wheat on both sides of the line looks fair, but to accept an offer of that kind pure and simple would, in my opinion, be a poor bargain for Canada. I believe that the longer the American tariff of 25 cents a bushel on Canadian wheat is maintained the better for us. Canadian wheat has now a distinct place in the British market. If the market of the United States were freely opened, it would be impossible to maintain its identity in passing through American elevators, and Canada would be the loser to the extent of any reduction in price.

A similar observation will apply to flour. Manitoba flour usually brings a higher price on Mark Lane than any American brand. Who could vouch for the genuineness of this brand if American wheat moved freely across the border? The poorer qualities on the south side of the line would be fortified by the products of Canadian mills, and the better qualities on the north side would be deteriorated by mixture from the south. Such an interchange would be throwing away all the advantages we possess for the great wheat belt of Manitoba and the west.

CANADIAN CHEESE PREEMINENT.

In the same way Canadian cheese, after years of experiment and large expenditure of money, has driven American cheese out of the British market. How could this preeminence be preserved if Canadian cheese passed through the hands of American shippers over the border? We have, therefore, to consider not the first profit, if profit there be, but the ultimate effect upon an industry which yields us annually about $30,000,000. The advance of a few cents in price in exceptional conditions of the market should not dominate the general effect on the large aspect of the question and the business interests of all the cheese factories of Canada.

The question of our lumbering industry has also its future aspect. No doubt the admission of lumber into the American market free of duty would enhance the value of lumber and probably the value of all standing marketable timber in Canada. But the personal interests of the lumbermen are not to be alone considered. One of the greatest questions now before the people of Canada is how to conserve their forests. Mr. Clifford Sifton, chairman of the Commission of Natural Resources, speaking before the Empire Club on the 20th of October, said: "At the end of 20 years the United States would have no timber for sale in the ordinary way. In Canada the supply was large, but if the supply in the United States ran out, the supply in Canada would last the United States for only 7 years. The time must come, however, when the people of Canada would demand legislation prohibiting the export of marketable timber." This is the national view and the only view which will do justice to Canadian interests. Can this view be maintained under a treaty?

QUESTION OF TRANSPORTATION.

We must also consider whether the general advantage of reciprocity in natural products might not be more than counterbalanced by the loss to Canada in transportation. We would not lose sight of this important fact, that if our natural products are freely admitted to the American market the United States railway will do a large part of their transportation to the markets of the world. On this point hear H. M. Whitney, in the article from which I have already quoted: "If we were to admit Canadian grain free from tariff charges, much of it would stay with us for home consumption; a portion of it would go through our ports to foreign lands. New York, Portland, and Boston are the natural outlets for the foreign trade of eastern Canada. The elevators for storing and handling Canadian grain should be on this side of the line, and the steamers of the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk Pacific should, in the wintertime at least, find their home in port in Boston, New York, and Portland." This clearly means that the transportation of Canadian grain would be diverted from the great systems of transcontinental railways east and west, which Canada has built or is building at enormous expense, to American railways, and that the elevators at Chicago, Buffalo, New York, and Boston would be substituted for the elevators at Winnipeg, Fort William-Midland, Port Colborne, and Montreal. So says an astute American financier. Do we want this? Mr. Whitney says it would be one of the advantages to the United States of reciprocity. But the loss to our railways would only be part of the loss to Canada. What about the loss to the great shipping companies on our lakes and canals; the loss from the handling of grain at our elevators and railway terminals; the loss to ocean freighters at Montreal, Quebec, and Halifax; the loss in harbor dues; the loss to the hundreds employed in handling freight; the loss to all importers of merchandise from the abandonment of Canadian ports by ocean steamers; the loss of national prestige by our becoming dependent upon the ports of the United States for an outlet to the markets of the world? What would British capitalists who invested their millions in these enterprises think of Canadians who for the petty advantage of an interchange of natural products would prejudice investments which have proved to be of untold advantage to Canada? These are not speculative dangers. We are told by a financier of Boston what will happen. Is this the fate a sensible people should desire? Are Canadians prepared to accept all these questions as a matter of course?

We hear dire predictions of the effect of Canadian products on our own, and a picture of darkest hue is held up to the farmers of this country. They are told that Canadian products will flood our markets and destroy our industries. One would think that all kinds of farm produce are massed along the border awaiting the removal of the tariff walls and ready to swamp the American farmer. We are led to believe that Canadian crops never fail; that their products can reach our markets before our own, and without any additional expense by reason of their remoteness; that their surplus will glut our markets and that it will be a holiday's play for these 8,000,000 people to absorb and take away the markets of our puny 90,000,000.

Mr. Ross, however, takes a very different view of the situation, and one, in my judgment, more consistent and gratifying to our pride as well as being more in harmony with what is likely to occur. He says:

But suppose the markets of the United States were thrown open to us, would that not greatly enhance our prosperity? The United States lie along our border of 4,000 miles with a population of 90,000,000. If we have anything to sell there is an unlimited market for us—why not let us enjoy it? This is a fascinating picture, but there is another side to it. The boundary is just as long for the Americans as for the Canadians, and a reciprocity treaty that opens one side of the line would also open the other. While our 7,000,000 were getting into the American markets with their merchandise the American 90,000,000 were getting into Canada, and the home market, always the best, where not glutted with goods, would be rendered practically valueless. The fruit grower would find American fruit in the market before him and everywhere so abundant that his trade would be ruined. The flour merchant, the seed merchant, the dealer in provisions, such as bacon, butter, and cheese, would be similarly situated, and any occasional sale that he could make in the United States would be poor compensation for the losses incurred on account of the surfeit of the home market by American goods.

This sounds very much like good protection argument, advanced in favor of a protective tariff. We were afraid the countries of Europe would send their surplus here and glut our markets. Therefore we wanted protection against this dumping process, as we may call it. So it is with Mr. Ross in Canada. He fears that there may be a dumping from the United States, and it seems to me that the surplus produced by 90,000,000 people is very much more likely to be dumped on 7,000,000 than that the surplus of those 7,000,000 shall be dumped upon our industries.

Is there not more reason in this contention than in the scarecrow held up to frighten our people? The Canadians have far more to fear from us than we have from them, and it does not harmonize very well with the boasting pictures with which we heretofore have tickled the ears of the people in Fourth of July orations to hold up before their affrighted eyes the picture of ruin and desolation that will come to our country from the competition of this comparatively small number of farmers, merchants, and business men struggling along under conditions far more unfavorable than those of most if not all of our people.

Those who oppose this legislation say that our representatives were no match for the representatives of Canada, and that they were so unprepared to compete with these gentlemen in the negotiations that the interests of our country were not protected and safeguarded. This very same argument is made by the opponents of the legislation in Canada, and convinces me that the representatives of each country faithfully guarded the interests of their own people, making mutual concessions in order that an agreement as nearly just to all as possible could be reached.

One of the leading papers of Canada, the Journal of Commerce, under date of February 3, 1911, says:

Our tardy representatives who accepted President Taft's invitation to endeavor to find a way to promote freer intercourse between the United States and Canada were undoubtedly not prepared to cope on equal terms with the gentlemen representing the other country. We have no intention of entering into a complete discussion of the details of the suggested agreement just now. To most critical observers it appears to contain certain provisions which make it exceedingly unlikely that it will ever become a law. That, like every one not in the secret, we were taken by surprise at the thorough-paced nature of the changes suggested, we need not say.

This legislation is objected to because Canada remits only about half the revenue that is remitted by us. This is considered a great and unwarranted concession on the part of our Government. The same argument, but presented in a different way, is urged in Canada by the opponents of the agreement there.

The Journal of Commerce of February 3, in discussing the alleged advantages of the agreement to the United States, says:

Why should Canada give away anything, then, in return for what is intended to be of benefit, not to her but to the United States? Why sacrifice to any, even in the slightest extent, our manufactures? Why give away our natural advantages in the paper-making industry? Why hand over our wheat to the United States millers and transportation companies when we have the facilities for handling our grain business already established at considerable cost? The official primary argument is that Canada sacrifices only $2,560,579 in duties, while the United States surrenders $4,849,933. Canada, to put it in another way, sacrifices about 32 cents per capita of its population per annum, while the United States sacrifices, say, 5½ cents per capita of its population per annum. And reputable United States journals gravely state that their country has gone more than halfway to meet Canada when its people give up 5½ cents a year each, expecting our citizens to surrender 32 cents a year each.

This proves that the point of view has much to do with the formation of our judgment and that arguments from figures can be made to fit almost any position. It is true that we remit twice as much revenue as Canada remits in the aggregate, but it is also true that they buy twice as much from us as we do from them, so that even from our standpoint proportionately they sacrifice as much in duties as we do. The article referred to concludes as follows:

The American Banker comes out frankly with the statement: "Fifty years ago the advantages of reciprocity were mainly on the Canadian side, but to-day the situation has changed entirely, and it is the United States and not Canada that gains the most by the removal or lowering of the tariff bars."

Those who are concerned about the future interests of Canada would do well to consider the proposed agreement from this point of view and give heed to the inquiry, "Who stands to gain by its provisions, and who pays the piper?"

Many of our Canadian friends seem to be very fearful that they may have to "pay the piper."

The principal objection urged against this legislation is its anticipated injurious effects on agriculture. It is predicted that its adoption will ruin the agricultural interests of the country, and especially of certain sections. There is unusual solicitude for the farmer by certain great interests in the country. I find no fault with them for it, but can not help but think they are trying to make use of the farmer more for their own benefit than for the farmers. No one desires to injure agriculture. The friends of this measure are just as much the friends of agriculture as those who oppose it, and those who support this measure are just as earnest and sincere in their belief in the beneficent effects of this legislation upon the agricultural as well as upon all other industries in the country as those who oppose it are sincere in their belief as to its injurious effects, and in the consideration of this legislation mutual devotion to the interests of agriculture should be conceded and the arguments for and against the legislation should be fairly and dispassionately considered.

Much of the argument against the legislation seems to be based upon the assumption that it affects all of our agricultural products, and many of the people have the belief that this bill proposes to admit agricultural products free of duty from all the world into this country. Such statements are made and impressions given, not for the purpose of deceiving the people, but to arouse antagonism and opposition to this measure. The fact is that it affects only the tariff upon products brought into this country from Canada. The tariff upon the same articles from other countries is left exactly the same as now. Our trade with Canada in agricultural products does not constitute all of our agricultural trade. The following table shows our exports to and imports from Canada in agricultural products from 1901 to 1910:

Exports to and imports from Canada.

Year ending June 30—	Domestic exports to Canada.	Imports from Canada.
1901	$27,550,201	$8,903,504
1902	27,915,718	8,965,179
1903	29,969,374	10,773,362
1904	25,503,353	9,834,551
1905	23,865,106	14,738,288
1906	30,411,035	10,830,240
1907	32,211,661	10,862,567
1908	30,518,478	11,380,705
1909	30,375,721	14,583,548
1910	38,409,260	18,403,873

From this it will be seen that our imports of agricultural products from Canada amounted to only $18,403,873. This is the amount of agricultural trade coming into this country now that is affected by this bill; not a very large trade, and not much when compared with our world's imports. What were our total agricultural imports in 1910? Over $638,000,000. In other words, this legislation affects a trade of a little over $18,000,000 worth of farm products and leaves unaffected over $620,000,000. The reduction on such a small amount of our imports will not and can not work so disastrously as predicted. He is surely "seeing things at night" who sees the ruin of our agricultural industries under such conditions.

These figures also illustrate the difference between this legislation and general tariff-revision legislation. If it were general tariff revision we would expect it to affect more or less all of the $638,000,000 of farm products instead of only the $18,000,000 from Canada. When we consider what an infinitesimally small amount of agricultural products imported from Canada are affected by this bill, compared with the tremendous industry that it is said will be destroyed, the fears of those who are opposed to it become all the more fantastical, the products of the industry to be destroyed and overwhelmed being estimated at almost $10,000,000,000 without taking into account the value of the tools, lands, and improvements used in connection with the production of this stupendous volume of products.

The opposition to this legislation charge that it is in the interest of certain trusts, and point to the trusts which they say will be benefited by it. Some in favor of it point to trusts opposing it. The one offsets the other. My judgment is that we will never injure a trust by reducing the tariff except as we may destroy an industry and thus injure all the people; nor will there be any special benefit to any trust by reducing the tariff. If it is a trust in domestic production it will control the price under any circumstances. Trusts will thrive and flourish, tariff or no tariff, during prosperity, and the way to handle them is by other legislative methods, but if we destroy the business of the country we are very likely to destroy all the trusts. That happened at a certain period in our country's history, and there probably is no one who desires its repetition.

It is urged, however, that as we take the tariff off of agricultural products we should take it off of agricultural implements, and because this is not done it is said the legislation is unfair to the farmers and favorable to the International Harvester Trust. We could very safely take the tariff off of agricultural implements coming from Canada, and I would be in favor of doing it, if Canada would take off her duties from agricultural implements. We can safely take the tariff off of agricultural implements coming from any country in the world, but because we do not do it is no valid argument against this measure.

The tariff on agricultural implements is reduced in this bill. It could be reduced more—yes, it could be taken off—if Canada would consent to it as a reciprocal measure; but, with the sales we make in Canada now under the present tariff, we should increase our sales there with this slight reduction.

It is said that this will benefit the manufacturer. Grant it. It will injure no one; and if it benefits the manufacturer, without injury to anybody else, why should anyone complain? The increase of business to the manufacturer will result in a benefit to his wage earners and his employees. It will increase their number, and in this way furnish an additional market for the product of the farm, thus benefiting the agriculturalist. If it increases the sale of agricultural implements in Canada, it must furnish an increased market for additional labor, and such a result is always to be desired, and has been one of the chief arguments in favor of the protective tariff system. It is urged, however, that we should take the tariff off of agricultural implements, so as to reduce the price of these manufactured products to our farmers, and it is attempted to make the farmer believe that he is greatly outraged in that his products are made free and agricultural implements are not.

The American farmer can not be fooled this way, and those who seek to do so insult his intelligence. He knows that to take the tariff off of agricultural implements from Canada would not mean any cheaper implements to him. He knows that free implements from Canada would not affect the price in this country one way or the other. Our manufacturers control the market in this country and largely so in Canada and the world. Our imports are practically nothing, while our annual exports are over $25,000,000, one-third of which goes to Canada. With the tariff removed from these articles there would be no foreign competition and, consequently, no reduction in prices. The President offered to take all the tariff off of farm implements coming from Canada if Canada would take all the tariff off of farm implements going to Canada. She would not agree to this. It is urged, however, that we should do so regardless of Canada. Should we do it? It would not benefit us any, and I can see a possible injury to us if we were to take the tariff off of agricultural implements and Canada retain her tariff on the implements from this country.

This would offer an inducement to our manufacturers to establish their plants in that country, so as to have both markets free. This would be a good thing for Canada, but it would not be a good thing for us. It would not hurt the manufacturers of agricultural implements, but it would deprive American labor of employment and the American farmer of a market. The capitalist and manufacturer would make just as much money by having his plant in Canada and employing Canadian labor. The injury by removing these plants to Canada would be to our wage earners and our farmers, and no reduction to us in the price of farm implements would follow.

During the years 1900 to 1910 we exported $128,000,000 worth of mowers and reapers and over $38,000,000 worth of plows and cultivators, with over $78,000,000 worth of other farm implements, or a total of over $245,000,000 worth. During this same period we imported the insignificant amount of $200,000 worth of farm implements. In other words, we have been selling to the world a hundred times as many agricultural implements as we have been buying from the world. We have been exporting about one-fifth of our home production, and those who denounce this measure because it does not admit all Canadian-made implements free have set up a bogy man with which to deceive the farmer.

I herewith print tables taken from the Statistical Abstract for 1909, showing the value of exported agricultural implements from 1900 to 1910 and the value of agricultural products manufactured in the United States as per census reports of 1905, and also table showing our exports to each of the principal countries of the world:

Some oppose this legislation because it does not go far enough. They declare themselves in favor of free trade with Canada, and because this bill does not bring free trade in everything, they oppose it. I am in favor of free trade with Canada, but I can not appreciate the force of the argument presented against the legislation because it does not give entire free trade. If free trade with Canada would be a good thing, this legislation is good, as far it goes.

It is urged against this legislation that, while free trade with Canada would be a good thing, free trade in farm produce is a bad thing unless accompanied by free trade in manufactured products. How free trade in manufactured products between this country and Canada would save the farmer from any injury that this legislation will otherwise bring to them I can not comprehend. If injury will come to the farmer under this legislation, that same injury would come to him under free trade between this country and Canada.

The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in a speech delivered February 12 of this year, is reported to have said:

> I am not one of those who believe that the free admission of agricultural products into the United States from Canada will materially affect our farmers, but I do believe that while we are admitting free the things which the farmer sells we should also admit free some of the things the farmer buys.

If the free admission of agricultural products will not materially affect our farmer, then the objection to this legislation by reason of the free admission of these agricultural products has no force. I am in favor of free trade in manufactured products, but if I can not get free trade I can not see why I should not get as near it as possible. Free trade in manufactured products from Canada would be of no substantial benefit to our farmers, because they could not compete with ours and would not come in here to any extent. It would not mean cheaper manufactured products to the farmers of this country at all. Would agricultural implements be cheaper if allowed to be imported free from Canada? Assuredly not. We are the greatest manufacturers of farm implements in the world, as I have already pointed out. Our manufacturers not only supply our home demand, but export millions of dollars worth of farm implements to Canada and the rest of the world. They fix and determine the price at which they are sold, and they would continue to do so no matter what the tariff may be between this country and Canada. There would be no competition from Canada that would bring lower prices to our farmers; and so it is with most of our manufactures. We sell to the Canadians a large part of their manufactured products now, which shows that we can undersell them. The Canadian farmer buys our manufactures now any pays the Canadian duty. Our farmer buys these manufactures and pays no duty, so that instead of being at a disadvantage with his Canadian neighbor our farmer has a real advantage in cheaper manufactured products. The President, through our representatives, proposed free trade to Canada. She would not accept it. He then secured the greatest reductions possible on manufactured products going into Canada and coming into this country from Canada. Material reductions accordingly were made and if, with the tariff as it has been heretofore, we have sold large quantities of manufactured products to the Canadians, it is but natural to expect that with these reductions we will largely increase our sales to Canada, thus benefiting and stimulating our manufacturers and indirectly, of course, benefiting the farmers with no injury or unfairness to them.

This is met with the charge that our manufacturers sell cheaper in Canada than they do in this country. I do not believe that this is true; at least, as a general rule, I do not see why they should do it. They are not moved by philanthropic motives in Canada any more than they are in this country. There is no competition there to force prices down, and, so far as I can learn, the prices of manufactures in Canada are generally higher than they are in this country, as would naturally be expected.

The tariff is removed from cattle, sheep, hogs, and so forth, coming from Canada, and this is said to be in the interests of the Beef Trust. This can only be true based upon the Democratic argument that the tariff on an imported article is not only added to the price of the article imported, but also is added to the price or cost of the domestic product, and that removing the tariff on these animals coming from Canada will of itself permit the Beef Trust to buy domestic animals that much cheaper and sell at the same rate as now. When I reach the point that I believe in this contention I shall no longer support a protective tariff. I do not believe in this contention at all; and I do not believe that the removal of the tariff on cattle, hogs, sheep, and so forth, coming from Canada will be of any special benefit to the Beef Trust.

If the Beef Trust buys stock in this country that has been imported from Canada, it simply buys at the local market prices and the tariff is paid by the man bringing the beef to our market. If these animals come in free of duty, the Beef Trust would still pay the market price. It is urged, however, that because of the removal of this tariff the Beef Trust will be benefited many millions of dollars in its purchases of domestic cattle. The Beef Trust now buys domestic cattle as cheaply as possible, and I assert that no man, not even the agent of the Beef Trust, takes into account the tariff on imported animals when he buys a cow or a hog in the stockyards at Chicago. He pays just what he has to pay to get the animal, no more and no less—tariff or no tariff. If the Beef Trust so controls the market that it is able to deduct the amount of the tariff on every domestic animal that it buys, then it so controls the market that the tariff makes no difference whatever in what it will pay. The Beef Trust can not buy cheaper in Canada if the tariff is taken off, because cattle are higher in Canada than in this country now, and, furthermore, there would not be a "drop in the bucket" left over from the home demand.

If, however, the tariff on beef, hams, bacon, and so forth, increases the price that we have to pay for our domestic beef, hams, bacon, and so forth, then there should be a substantial reduction in the price of these articles, because there is a very substantial reduction in the tariff; and if the arguments of the opponents of this legislation are good, then the consumer will get a great benefit from these reductions.

For instance, the tariff now on hams and bacon is 4 cents a pound. By the proposed legislation it is reduced to only 1¼ cents a pound, or a reduction of 2¾ cents on each pound. This ought to mean a very substantial reduction to the consumers of ham and bacon, and this without injury to the farmer. So it is with other meat products.

We could safely remove the tariff on meat products as well as on live animals, so far as Canada is concerned. Canada would not consent to this, however, but if we were to take the tariff all off without her removing it the same result would occur in regard to the meat-packing industry as in the agricultural-implement manufacturing industry. Many beef-packing establishments would remove from this country and locate in Canada, in order to have both markets free, to the injury of our own people without any corresponding benefit. Taking the tariff off of meat products from Canada, however, would not affect the price in this country, because our importations would be very small, if any at all. There would not be sufficient competition to make any material reduction.

In 1909 we imported $969,000 worth of meat products from all the world, upon which we collected a revenue of $212,000. In that same year we exported over $17,000,000 worth of beef products, over $108,000,000 worth of hog products, and over $30,000,000 worth of products such as lard compounds, mutton, poultry, sausage, and so forth; or a total of over $156,000,000 worth of meat products.

From this it is clear to me that the admission of live stock free of duty from Canada and a reduction of duties on the manufactured products can not result in any injury to the meat and cattle industry of this country, the total product of which, according to the census of 1905, amounted to over $816,000,000; and the conditions in Canada make it clear to me also that the removal of the duty on live animals is of no special benefit to the Beef Trust.

The opposition to this measure seems to center around wheat, and it is attempted to array the farmers of the country against this legislation because it is claimed that the price of wheat is lower in Canada than it is in this country, and that if we take the tariff off of wheat and other farm products it means the depression in price of our own products and the ruination of the agricultural interests. If it would materially, or at all, affect the price of wheat in this country, it would be a matter for serious consideration. We produce about 700,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. Canada produces something over 100,000,000 bushels annually and has for exportation about 50,000,000 bushels. Not all of this could come into this country, because of the lack of transportation facilities, but that which would come in would reach our markets at a greater cost for transportation than our own, so that it would not materially reduce the price. Canada does not have the railroad transportation facilities that we have, and the farmers to reach their own markets must haul their wheat long distances, compared with ours.

If you examine Canada's railroad development, you will see that much of the wheat can be delivered only at certain points to be carried by certain railroads to certain other points of distribution. This makes their transportation charges much greater than ours, and very likely in most instances accounts for the price of wheat in this country and in Canada. It is said, however, that the difference in price is 10 or 12 cents a bushel in favor of wheat on our side of the line, and that this condition is due to the tariff, and if that tariff should be removed our wheat would come down to the Canadian price or ours would come down and theirs would come up until they met, so that the result would be a material reduction in the price of our wheat. I do not believe that this is true.

An examination of the statistics shows that there is a great variation in the prices of wheat at different times and at different places. The tariff is a constant quantity; and if it is the cause of the difference, that difference should be reasonably uniform. The tariff is 25 cents a bushel on wheat; and if it is the cause of the difference in price, that difference should be substantially 25 cents. Statistics can be found sustaining almost any contention with reference to the price of products at various times and places, but it seems to me that those who attribute the difference in price of wheat in this country and Canada to the tariff overlook the fact that just as great variations exist among different localities in this country as appear between this country and Canada, and these great variations prove conclusively that these differences in prices are the result of other causes than the tariff.

The Crop Reporter, issued by the Department of Agriculture, shows the price of wheat in this country at various points on the 1st of June, 1911, and I desire to call attention to some of these figures.

On that date wheat was selling in Maine at $1.15 a bushel and in New York at 89 cents, or a difference of 26 cents. These States are not very far apart, are very similarly situated, and there is no tariff wall between them, so that this difference of 26 cents a bushel must be accounted for in some other way, and goes to prove that even if the tariff was taken off between this country and Canada there might be even a greater difference in price between wheat at Winnipeg and wheat at Minneapolis. In New Jersey wheat was 96 cents a bushel and in the adjoining State of Pennsylvania only 90 cents. In North Carolina it was $1.04, and in the adjoining State of South Carolina $1.12; while in Georgia it was $1.23. In Michigan wheat was 84 cents, while in the adjoining State of Wisconsin, similarly situated and with no tariff wall between, it was 90 cents. In Minnesota wheat was 88 cents a bushel, and in the State just south of it, Iowa, with even better transportation facilities but without any tariff wall, wheat was 82 cents a bushel. In North Dakota wheat was 87 cents a bushel, while in Nebraska it was only 77 cents. In Oklahoma wheat was 87 cents a bushel, and in Kansas it was only 81 cents a bushel. In Idaho wheat was 72 cents a bushel, while in Washington it was 77 cents, and in the neighboring State of Oregon 81 cents, and in California 93 cents.

These last three States are exporting States and are very similarly situated, and yet the export price varies from 77 cents in Washington to 93 cents in California. These figures are even more marked in the variations in similarly situated sections of this country than the prices between Minnesota and Dakota and neighboring points in Canada. These same variations appear in the prices of oats, barley, and so forth.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does not the Senator think that attention should be called to the fact that the difference between the price of wheat at those several shipping points was because of the difference in freight rates to tidewater?

Mr. JONES. I do not think there was any very great variation between Oregon, Washington, and California.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and that accounts for it. Oregon wheat shipments are practically at tidewater; Idaho wheat shipments from some parts of the State are a greater distance than from other parts of the State; and the same is true of Washington. The price of wheat depends upon the freight from the shipping point to tidewater.

Mr. JONES. There is practically no difference between shipments from Washington and Oregon. I am thoroughly familiar with that situation. These prices are governed by prices at exporting points on tide water.

For instance, on the same date barley was 68 cents in Ohio, 62 cents in Indiana, 69 cents in Illinois, 75 cents in Michigan, and 84 cents in the neighboring State of Wisconsin, or 22 cents more than in Indiana. It was 68 cents in North Dakota, 49 cents in Kansas, and 80 cents in Montana. If anyone will ascertain the causes of these variations in States similarly situated, and without any tariff walls between them, they will very likely be able to explain the causes of the variations between this country and Canadian points.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. Yes; although I do not imagine we can reach any more definite conclusion than we now have. We will each be of the same opinion still.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Only on this point. I concede there is ground for discussion, at least with reference to an article of which we produce a surplus, but that is not true with reference to barley. We do not produce a surplus of barley, but we import barley. Of flaxseed the same is true. We do not export flax, but we import it; and, to a certain extent, that is true of a great many other articles which are produced upon the farm upon which there is a tariff duty. Now, does the Senator mean to lay down a rule here that as to the innumerable articles produced on the farm of which we do not produce a surplus the tariff makes no difference with reference to the price, and that the taking away of the tariff upon the importation of such articles from Canada, which is our only competitor in regard to them, will make no difference in the price?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am simply presenting these figures, taken from official sources, to show that in a country 3,000 miles long and 1,500 miles wide, with absolute free trade within her borders, there are just as great variations in prices between different places similarly situated as exist between this country and Canada, between which there is a tariff. So that the argument of those who contend that the tariff is the cause of this variation does not seem to me to hold good. But I am simply presenting the facts with regard to it. Of course, I do not expect my friend from South Dakota to reach the same conclusion that I reach from these figures.

If the tariff were removed it is inevitable that these same variations would occur. At some points prices would be lower in Canada than at points in this country, while at other points the prices would be higher than in this country. These variations also show that there is no basis for the argument that to remove the tariff would put the prices in this country on a level with the prices in Canada.

The foregoing facts are set out in more detail in the following table from the Crop Reporter of June, 1911, which shows the value of certain products in May and June of this year:

Mr. President, I have heard our friends contending about the difference in price along the border, in Dakota and Minnesota, as compared with Canada. They have said that the difference there is about 10 or 12 cents a bushel, and they say that that is caused by the tariff. I have not been satisfied with that contention. I have rather felt, as we are a large exporting country in wheat, that the export price very largely controls, and that the price ought to be substantially the same between the points on the border both in Canada and in this country, other things being equal, and that variations, as I have shown, might occur independent of the tariff. But the contention has been so strenuously urged that the tariff is the cause of that difference that I have tried to find out whether there is any other reason for this difference in price; and I think I have found a very conclusive reason, and one given by an authority that, in my judgment, can not be questioned. On the 3d day of April, 1909, my friend the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] delivered a speech in the House of Representatives, and this is what he said:

The duty on wheat has in the past been of little benefit to the farmer. So long as we export the amount of wheat and wheat flour that we have exported every year these last 30 years, it is evident that any tariff that we may levy will not affect the price of wheat.

I want to say that the lowest export that we have had of wheat and flour was in 1905, before this speech was made, when our exports, according to the Statistical Abstract, were only a little over 44,000,000 bushels. Last year we exported about 87,000,000 bushels of wheat—nearly 100,000,000 bushels.

If we export 100,000,000 bushels of wheat every year the price of wheat in this country will not exceed the price in the world's market minus the cost of transportation to that market, no matter if we levy a tariff of 500 per cent. The tariff against Canada to keep her wheat from coming into competition with ours is at the present absolutely without effect, as we are compelled to compete with her products when we export our wheat.

Here is the reason, and a good one, too, for the difference in price between towns on the border in Canada and in this country.

It is true—

Says the Senator from North Dakota—

It is true that near the border on the Canadian side the price of wheat is often a good deal lower than on the American side.

Even in these years when our exports have been over 100,000,000 bushels, and when the price has been controlled by the export price, the Senator from North Dakota says that even under that condition the price has been a good deal lower on the American side:

This, however, is due to the inferior means of transportation at that particular point in Canada—and I regret to say that the elevators at those points have formed effective trusts or entered into gentlemen's agreements with each other whereby they rob the poor Canadian farmer of often as much as 10 cents a bushel. This does not benefit the American farmer, however. He does not receive what the Canadian farmer loses. It is all pocketed by these elevators.

That is the reason given by the Senator from North Dakota. He continued—

Mr. President, this refutes all the present contention regarding the difference along the border, and I am willing to let it rest on this statement by the Senator when reciprocity was not pending.

Another basis of opposition to this legislation is that land is worth more in this country than it is in Canada. Land may be worth more in this country than in Canada, but instead of this being a reason for reducing the tariff, to my mind it is all the more reason why there is no need of the tariff. Relative values placed upon the lands in the respective countries should not weigh in the matter of fixing the tariff. The owner of valuable land is not entitled to protection because his land is worth more than that of his neighbor. On the contrary, it would seem that the man whose land is not valuable should be entitled to protection against the man whose land is valuable. I have orchard land which I consider worth $2,000 an acre. Is that a good reason why I should have a tariff on apples as against the Canadian whose lands are worth only $250 an acre? I think not. The increase in the value of lands has come largely through settlement and surrounding development and not through such a great investment. Tariff or no tariff, lands in Canada will increase in value as the country settles and develops. This land increase in both countries is not so much the result of labor and effort on the part of the owner or the investment of his capital, and should not be taken into account. Lands in some sections of Canada have increased quite rapidly during the last 10 years. So have they in this country, however, and they have increased much more rapidly in some sections of the country than in others, and yet would anyone argue that because lands in one State have increased much more rapidly than in another a tariff wall should be maintained between such States or that the lack of the tariff wall injures one and helps the other? I can not think so.

No more remarkable increases in land values have occurred in Canada during the last 10 years than have occurred in various sections of this country. These increases have occurred not only in the newer sections of the country, but also in the old and more settled sections of the country, and while the percentages in some States are greater than in others, the actual increases are amazing. For instance, Illinois increased in the value of her farms from $1,500,000,000 to over $3,000,000,000, or an increase of $1,500,000,000, in 10 years. Minnesota increased from $550,000,000 to over $1,000,000,000, although the area in farm lands increased only 5 per cent. North Dakota increased from $173,000,000 to $729,000,000 in value, or 320 per cent, although the increase in acreage was only 83 per cent. Montana increased from $45,000,000 to $225,000,000, or 394 per cent, while the increase in acreage was only 62 per cent. Idaho increased from $35,000,000 to $219,000,000, or 518 per cent, while the increase in acreage was only 64 per cent. Washington increased from $99,000,000 to $515,000,000, or 419 per cent, while her farm area increased only 37 per cent. While the new and western sections have gained more in percentages the older sections have increased tremendously, and these increases simply demonstrate what the result would be in various localities if this development and settlement continues through contiguous territory. The aggregate increase in value of farm lands the last 10 years has been over $15,000,000,000, or 118 per cent. With an increase such as is shown by this table we need no protection from Canada by means of a tariff because of the increase threatened in her land values. The development of her territory will bring increases not only to her lands but also to ours, just as increases in our western lands have brought an increase to eastern lands.

The admission of horses, cattle, hogs, and so forth, free of duty to the two countries, respectively, in my judgment, will be of tremendous value to our farmers. Horses under this bill go into Canada free of duty. Have our farmers any cause to fear an arrangement of this kind? In 1910 we had over 21,000,000 head of horses, while Canada had only a little over 2,000,000. There are 10 times as many horses in this country as in Canada. They will not send their horses here because horses are higher in price in Canada than they are in this country.

The Tariff Board, in its report transmitted to the Senate by the President March 1, 1911, at page 113, says:

As to horses, Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario. The agricultural development of the northwestern Provinces has put prices of work stock and heavy draft teams at a premium in the territory tributary to Winnipeg. During the spring of 1910 it is stated on good authority that not less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta combined have but 1,863,744 head as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the State of Iowa alone.

The average value of horses in this country in 1910 was $108.19, and in 1909 the average value was $95.64, while in Canada the average value of horses in 1909 was $130.70. We therefore need have no fear of competition from Canada in horses. On the contrary, we may expect to be able to increase our sales in that country. As a matter of fact, if Canada develops as rapidly as is expected by those who oppose this measure, it can not help but result in increasing wonderfully the demand for horses, which demand will have to be supplied from this country, and in that way be a positive benefit to our farmers. With the use of the automobile growing, as it seems to be doing in this country, we must look forward to a less demand for horses here, and any measure that will maintain that demand or increase it can not help but benefit our agricultural population. The States that ought to receive the greatest benefit from this source are Minnesota and the Dakotas, and if they will prepare to take advantage of the market for horses that is likely to be developed they will reap a rich reward.

What about cattle? In 1910 we had over 69,000,000 head of cattle, and in 1909 Canada had a little over 7,000,000, or almost the same ratio as horses, to wit, 1 to 10. In 1910 the average value of milch cows in this country was $32.36, and all other cattle $17.49, while in Canada in 1909 the average value of milch cows was $36.36, or $4 higher per head than in this country, while the average value of all other cattle was $28.81, or $11.32 a head greater in Canada than in this country, and if the expected development takes place in Canada, what a tremendous market will be opened to our farmers if they are prepared to take advantage of it.

The Tariff Board says, at page 112:

The western Provinces are not in the cattle business or in sheep breeding to the extent frequently intimated.

And therefore if the development takes place in these western Provinces that some of our friends fear, North Dakota, Minnesota, and Montana would find a market for their cattle that would far more than counterbalance any loss that might be occasioned in the price of their wheat.

What is the situation in regard to sheep? In 1910 we had over 57,000,000 head of sheep in this country, while Canada, in 1909, had 2,700,000, a less number than it had in either 1907 or 1908, and only about one twenty-fifth of the number that we have. In 1910 the average value per head of sheep in this country was $4.08 and in 1909 it was $3.43, while in Canada in 1909 the average value per head of sheep was $5.89. Not very much reason, either in price or in numbers, to fear the overturning of our industry from that source.

The Tariff Board, at page 118, says, after giving the figures for sheep in the various Provinces of Canada:

As indicated by these figures, the industry centers in the Province of Ontario, and yet the entire Province has fewer sheep than the State of Ohio. * * *

While the sheep industry in Canada at the present time is a minor one, the feeding of lambs for market has been an important business in Ontario, as many as 125,000 head having been exported as late as 1907 to the United States and 33,000 the same year to Great Britain. The surplus has now dwindled, however, to such an extent that practically none was received at the Buffalo stockyards during 1910. In fact it is reported that a few American-fed lambs have been shipped from Buffalo to Toronto, indicating that Ontario at the present time is scarcely supplying her own wants in this regard. This is, however, an abnormal condition.

While the soil and climate of Ontario are favorable to this industry, experience has shown that when large flocks have been maintained losses from the ravages of disease sooner or later render the industry upon that basis unprofitable.

* * * * * * *

In the Saskatchewan country sheep raising as a branch of farming has not made any great progress. The cost of fencing and ravages of wild animals are given as contributing causes. In Manitoba the feeding of range sheep about such grain centers as Moose Jaw, Brandon, and Port Arthur, where screenings must accumulate in quantities, should, in the opinion of the Dominion department of agriculture, become an important business. The Winnipeg market is supplied mainly from these western ranges, although some frozen mutton is brought in from maritime Provinces. In British Columbia a few sheep of the English type are maintained in the interior as well as on Vancouver Island, but mutton is imported, nevertheless, from the State of Washington as well as from Australia. The coast climate is mild on the lower mainland and in the islands of the Gulf of Georgia, and rearing lambs for market would, therefore, be a feasible proposition.

The sheep business of the entire Canadian Northwest is insignificant at present as compared with our own, the total for Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia combined being but 380,000 head, contrasting sharply with Wyoming's reputed 7,316,000.

What effect may we expect on our hog-raising industry? In 1910 we had 47,700,000 head of swine, while Canada had only 2,900,000 head in 1909, but this number is less than it had in either 1907 or 1908. The average value of swine in this country per head was $9.14, while in 1909 the average value was $6.55; and in Canada the average value per head in 1909 was $11.80.

The following table is taken from the report of the Tariff Board and shows the number and average value per head of live stock on farms, by classes, in specified States and in Canada; and a study of this data, it seems to me, will convince anyone that agricultural interests along these lines have nothing to fear from Canada, but, on the contrary, they can hope for great benefit from free access into any section of Canada that may develop rapidly:

The total value of farm animals in 1910 was over $5,000,000,000, while in Canada in 1909 the total value of farm animals was only a little over $558,000,000, or about one-tenth of what it is in this country. If the entire product of farm animals in Canada were brought into this country, it would have but little effect upon our markets, and after deducting what they need for their own use there is very little left to come here. As I already have suggested, there is every reason to believe that, with farm animals going into Canada free, there will be a greatly increased demand from this country, which will lead not only to an increase in production but to an increase in price and go a long way toward balancing any possible loss that may come from tariff reductions on grain; and it will further tend to a diversity in this country that will be a positive benefit to the farmer.

Some even have contended that wages are higher in this country than in Canada, and an attempt has been made to show that the labor cost of production is lower there than here. Anyone taking into account the general conditions in Canada as compared to the United States must reach the conclusion that there can not be much difference in the cost of labor between the two countries, and whatever difference may exist will be more favorable to higher wages in many parts of Canada than in this country. It is largely a pioneer country. Development is just taking place. Laborers are not plentiful, and, as has been the case in all sections of the country where rapid development is going on, labor and almost everything else is naturally higher than in older-settled, stable sections. It seems to me idle to claim that wages generally are lower in Canada than in the United States in any line of industry, and I think we are absolutely safe in assuming that wages as a general rule are substantially the same.

As with reference to various natural products, figures can be secured showing that at one point or in one Province wages are lower than at some point or in some State of the United States, but figures can be presented showing the great variations of wages in this country, and these variations are just as marked between different Provinces in Canada and greater than appears between this country and similar places in Canada.

In the Crop Reporter for March, 1911, the average farm wages in the different States, without board, are given. In New England and the Middle States the range is from $29 a month in Pennsylvania to $36 per month in Connecticut. In the South Atlantic States the range is from $16.50 in South Carolina to $25 in Florida. In spite of this, however, no one seems to feel that this disparity is a menace to the prosperity of either section. In Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin prices range from $28.40 in Indiana to $37.25 in Wisconsin. These States are very similarly situated, with almost identical conditions, with this suggestive circumstance, that in the more northern State of Wisconsin the wages are $9 higher than in Indiana. In the North Central States west of the Mississippi River the range is from $29.50 in Nevada to $42 in North Dakota, while in the Western and Pacific Coast States the range is from $44.50 in Oregon to $50 in the neighboring and northern State of Washington. These figures show a variation in the northern States from $28.40 in Indiana to $50 in Washington. The variation in the different Provinces of Canada is substantially the same, and the wages in the various Provinces are very similar to those in the corresponding States. The following is a statement by the Tariff Board concerning wages:

> In general, it may be said that the wages of experienced season hands (hands employed for a period of seven, seven and a half, or eight months, beginning about April 1) are on the same general level in Manitoba and Minnesota, and also on the same general level in Saskatchewan and North Dakota, and they are higher in the last-named localities than in the two first named. Where North Dakota and Manitoba join each other the wages for season hands are about $5 higher in North Dakota than in Manitoba. The wages of harvest hands are practically the same throughout the two Provinces and the three States included in this investigation, with the exception of certain large farms in the States, where the rate is about 50 cents per day below the prevailing rate on the smaller farms.

The following table of the averages of male farm labor during the past year is from the Crop Reporter for March, 1911, and is based upon the reports of agents and correspondents of the Bureau of Statistics:

The same conditions that make labor higher in our new and Western States than in the Eastern States will make wages higher in Canada than in the United States, and these general conditions are a far better guide and a safer criterion by which to judge what those wages are than a few specific instances here and there.

This legislation also is opposed on the ground that the manufacturer of flour will have a greater protection under it than under the present law. Some seem to think this is very easy of demonstration, and prove it by what seem to be simple and uncontrovertible mathematics. It does look like there should not be much difficulty in showing whether this is true or not, and it does not appear difficult to me, and yet I reach an entirely different conclusion in my mathematics. Assuming for the moment the contention of our Democratic friends that the manufacturer adds substantially the amount of the tariff to his manufactured product—an assumption which I do not concede except for the sake of the argument—what is the situation from this standpoint with reference to a barrel of flour? The tariff on wheat is 25 cents a bushel. It takes about 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. Practically all of our flour is made from wheat of our own production, but under Democratic contention the tariff on a barrel of flour, by reason of the tariff on wheat, is $1.12½. The miller, of course, does not pay the tariff when he buys domestic wheat; but if their argument is correct, he can add the $1.12½ as a part of the cost of his barrel of flour. This is Democratic argument, and I am sorry to say that some of our Republican friends seem to be driven to this contention to justify their opposition to this legislation. Then there is a tariff of 25 per cent ad valorem on flour, and this is equivalent to $1.25 a barrel, assuming the price of a barrel of flour to be $5. Therefore, according to the argument of those who contend that the tariff is added upon the domestic product, there is no reason why the miller can not add this $1.25 to the price of a barrel of flour, so that this argument leads to the conclusion that the tariff on a barrel of flour, under the present law, which the miller can take from his customers, amounts to $2.37½.

Now, what does this arrangement do? It takes the tariff off of wheat entirely, so that the miller can have no excuse for increasing the price of a barrel of flour because of the tariff on wheat. It reduces the ad valorem to a straight 50 cents on a barrel of manufactured flour, so that the situation is simply this: Instead of there being a tariff of $2.37½ on the wheat and flour in a barrel of flour there will be, under this arrangement, a tariff of 50 cents only on a barrel of flour. If that is not a benefit to the consumer of flour in this country, I can not understand how any benefit can come under any circumstances by the reduction of the tariff. If this is not to be considered a substantial reduction from the present law, I do not know what a substantial reduction would be. The trouble with the mathematics of the opposition is that it assumes that the miller pays to the domestic farmer the tariff of 25 cents a bushel on wheat, and, without adding this to the cost of flour in the barrel, simply deducts it from the $1.25 tariff placed on a barrel of imported flour, and concludes that the real protection now is simply the difference between $1.12½ on wheat and the $1.25 on the manufactured flour. If the miller pays to the farmer the tariff of 25 cents a bushel on wheat, he adds that as a part of the cost of his flour, and has the $1.25 protection above that; so that on this basis there is a reduction from $1.25 on a barrel of flour to 50 cents, or a substantial reduction of 75 cents.

It is strongly contended, however, that wheat has fallen since this reciprocity agitation started, and this is given as an argument to prove that if the legislation passes it will injuriously affect the price of wheat. It is true that wheat is lower now than it was last year, and yet it has advanced throughout the country nearly 2 cents a bushel June 1 than it was May 1 of this year, and it is just as reasonable to contend that reciprocity agitation raised the price of wheat 2 cents a bushel from May 1 to June 1 as to contend that the reciprocity agitation has lowered the price of wheat this year below what it was last year. Corn, which all must concede will not be directly affected by this reciprocity agreement, averaged 10 cents less than last year, but on June 1 it was nearly 5 cents more a bushel than on May 1. Potatoes, which will surely be affected by this legislation as much as wheat, were 26 cents a bushel higher June 1 of this year than June 1 of last year. Hay, which it is claimed will be very injuriously affected by this legislation, was $1.35 more per ton than last year. Barley, another crop which, it is feared, will be very injuriously affected, was 16 cents a bushel more than last year, and since this reciprocity agitation it has reached the record mark. If reciprocity has been affecting the prices of these various products, it has been acting both ways at the same time.

The opposition to this measure seems to be based upon the theory that to take the tariff off will reduce the price. On this assumption they overlook the benefits that will accrue to the farmers of the country by reason of the reduction in the tariff on articles which the farmers very largely buy. The farmer is impressed with the belief that, while his products are reduced by the tariff, nothing that he buys carries any reduction. What are the facts? The farmer buys dried fruit, upon which there is now a tariff of 2 cents a pound. This is removed entirely, so that the farmer, as well as the laboring man, should receive considerable benefit from this reduction. It may be said that we are getting no dried fruit from Canada, and yet our imports last year were over 1,200,000 pounds. The consumption of dried fruit in this country is very great; and on the theory that the tariff is added not only to the imported article, but to the domestic product, this reduction would mean a great saving to the farmer and to the consumer of dried fruit. Farmers generally are consumers and not producers of cheese. The tariff on cheese is 6 cents a pound. This is removed entirely. The farmer is a great consumer of salt. The tariff on salt in bags is 11 cents a hundred pounds and in bulk 7 cents a hundred. Salt is made free. Cream separators, upon which there is a tariff of 25 per cent ad valorem, are free. Barbed fencing wire, iron or steel, bears a tariff of three-fourths of a cent a pound. This is made free. Fresh meats, beef, and so forth, now paying 1¼ cents a pound, are reduced to 1¼ cents. The farmer buys a great deal of bacon and ham, and this is especially true of the wheat farmer. The tariff is now 4 cents a pound on bacon and ham. By this bill it is reduced to 1¼ cents a pound, or a reduction of 2¾ cents a pound. If any benefits accrue to anyone by a reduction of the tariff, this reduction ought to bring a material benefit to the farmer, as well as to every consumer of bacon and ham. Dried meats are reduced from 25 per cent ad valorem to 1¼ cents per pound. Lard compounds are reduced from 25 per cent ad valorem to 1¼ cents per pound. Farmers consume a great deal of canned tomatoes, corn, and other canned vegetables. The tariff is now 40 per cent ad valorem, which amounts to about 4 cents a pound. By this legislation the tariff is reduced to 1¼ cents a pound. On flour there is a tariff of 25 per cent ad valorem, which amounts to about $1.25 a barrel. This is reduced to 50 cents. While this may not bring any reduction to the loaf of bread, it ought to benefit the farmer, who usually buys his flour by the sack or barrel. If flour is reduced in price, this reduction, if continued any length of time, will be reflected in cheaper loaves of bread or larger ones. Oatmeal and other cereals are reduced from 40 cents a hundred pounds to 12½ cents a hundred. Bran, middlings, and so forth, are reduced from 20 per cent to 12½ cents per hundred. Farm wagons, on which there is now a tariff of 35 to 40 per cent ad valorem, are reduced to 22½ per cent, or a reduction of nearly 50 per cent. Plows, tooth and disk harrows, upon which the tariff now ranges from 15 to 25 per cent ad valorem, are reduced to 15 per cent. Hay loaders, potato diggers, and so forth, upon which the tariff is now 45 per cent ad valorem, are reduced to 20 per cent, a reduction of more than 50 per cent.

These are only a few of the reductions made in this bill. If any benefit accrues to anyone it will accrue largely to the farmers, and in addition to the benefit to the farmer there will be great benefits to the millions of others in the country who are consumers but not producers of farm products.

It is said, however, that the railroads will be benefited by this legislation, and this is urged as a reason why it should not be passed. How will the railroads be benefited? By carrying Canadian products in this country and by carrying our products into Canadian territory. That will certainly injure no one else, and if it benefits the railroads it means more employment for American trainmen and the expansion of an American industry, and that will be a benefit to all. The railroads may realize more benefits from the business they will secure than they should, but the increase in business, the additional men employed, and the wages paid will be a great gain to the entire country, and the mere fact that some railroad or railroad company will receive some benefit by reason of increased business does not seem to me to be any legitimate ground for opposing this measure. We usually deem an increase in business along any line beneficial to all. If the benefit to the railroad would come at the expense of the rest of the people of the country, or some particular industry, then I would be against it. But it will not. Those who oppose this legislation on the ground that it is legislation in favor of the Meat Trust, Flour Trust, Implement Trust, and railroads have very poor argument to stand on, and I do not believe that the people will be fooled by any mere assertion unfounded by fact or reason that this legislation is framed in the interest of or will be of any special benefit to any of these trusts. The mere assertion of such benefit, no matter how vehement, does not make it so, and no tariff reduction could be made that could not be alleged to be of benefit to some trust.

This legislation is opposed further because it is said that it will cause a great development in Canada, and many of our people will go there. If Canada is developed, such development will not only benefit her, but also us, and none so much as the States along the border. What lands are the least valuable in the Dakotas, and in any State of the Union, for that matter? The lands on the edge of settlement, and as the line of the settlement advances the land to the rear of it increases in value. So it will be with the development of Canada. As the land to the north of us develops the land in our own territory will increase in value and the owners will have cause to rejoice at rather than regret the advance of prosperity into Canada. Not only is this true, but many of those actually benefited by such development will be our own people. Much fear is expressed that many of our people will leave our country and go to Canada. This to an extent will be true, and I for one am not prepared to say that this is a good and valid reason for opposing this measure. There are many in this country, on the farm and in the city, who are eking out a bare existence and looking with longing eyes to vacant lands which they would like to own, but the high value placed on them is prohibitory. There are many renters in Illinois and other States who are forcing out a bare existence with much hard work and giving half of their toil to the owners of the lands they occupy. There are those in the city toiling from morning till night, while their families are living in cramped quarters and amid filthy surroundings, who would like to get out in the broad sunlight and become the owners of a small tract of land upon which to build a home.

Many of these people may go to Canada in the hope of securing a home. Our lands are too high priced, our public lands suitable for homesteads are practically all gone, and those who are attempting to acquire title to what public lands are remaining are looked upon and treated as criminals. These are the people whose lot is hard and whose prospects are dark, and if they can be helped, if they can secure lands upon which they can build a home and make a good living and become independent, happy, and prosperous no one should object. If our friends, neighbors, and relatives can add to their happiness by locating in Canada with free-trade relations with us, I am glad to give them the opportunity, because that legislation which adds to the sum of human happiness is the legislation that meets my approval. In doing this we are not favoring a foreign race, but are favoring our own kith and kin. That it may bring happiness along these lines is one reason why I am for it. And every man who may thus build up a home will be a better customer even for our products than he is now.

The tremendous resources and great prospects for development in Canada are urged as arguments against this legislation. To my mind they are arguments favorable to it. If the development that is anticipated by the passage of this bill takes place in Canada, it will not only be of direct benefit to many of our homeless families and homeless toilers, but it will furnish and develop a market for our products of all sorts and kinds that will increase our prosperity to a wonderful degree. I can not illustrate this better than by just what is happening now in my own section of the country. The best market that our lumber people have to-day is in Canada, and it is the result of the development there. They are selling their lumber in Canada at a higher price than they can get for it in this country, because the lumber mills of Canada are not sufficiently developed to meet the demand for lumber.

So it would be with many of our products of farm and factory with the anticipated development to take place there. They can not produce the great variety of products that we can; but if they have the money with which to buy they will consume these products. They can get them from no other source but from our own farmers, and what will come to us in this way will more than balance any possible injury to any particular industry. We have no section in the country that has to depend upon wheat alone, and the sooner the present wheat sections of the country diversify their crops and products the better off will these farmers become; and if this legislation promotes a development in Canada that encourages a diversity of crops in this country it will be a blessing instead of a curse.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in the debate on the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, on page 1724 of the RECORD, in answering some suggestions of Mr. Elkins, of West Virginia, said:

> The second proposition is that even though we have to change from wheat we will change to some other crop.

There is no suggestion that the people of North Dakota are confined to any one crop now and for the future. If wheat becomes less profitable, they will take up something else. The development that is anticipated means not only the building of farm homes, but it means the building of towns and cities and great business communities, and this means simply the expansion to a great extent of our own possibilities and industrial trade, commerce, and wealth. Especially would this mean, as I have already pointed out, a tremendous demand for cattle, hogs, and horses, that would naturally be supplied by the farmers of our border States, as well as the tremendous demand for manufactured products of all kinds.

The Senator from North Dakota says that the profit to the farmer is only $2.06 per acre. That may be the profit to the wheat farmer, but a diversity of crops would increase that profit immensely. I assume that this $2.06 profit comes to the man who owns and works the farm. If this is true, then what must be the profit of the man who rents from another, giving one-half of the crop, or $5 or $6 an acre cash rent? He simply ekes out an existence, while his landlord gets the benefit without any exertion on his part. If I can open up any avenue by which the man who gives one-half of his toil to another can secure a tract of land upon which he can work for himself and his family, I am ready to do it.

This legislation is urged to be unfair because it admits the products of the farmer free and imposes a tariff on manufactured products. This is a plausible argument, but not a valid one. The products of the farmer of Canada are admitted into this country free. The products of the farmers of this country are admitted into Canada free, so that there is no unfairness as between the farmers of the two countries. The tariff on most of the manufactured articles used by the farmer is reduced and made the same between the two countries, so that the farmer of Canada, so far as the tariff is concerned, is put upon the same plane as the farmer of this country, and therefore there is no unfairness as between the farmers of the two countries with reference to the tariff on manufactured products. But it is said the farmer in this country has to buy his implements, meats, flour, and so forth, in a protected market. So does the farmer of Canada, and to a much greater degree than our farmers. As a matter of fact, the farmer of Canada buys largely in a protected market because most of the articles they buy have been imported and have paid a tariff. Our farmer, as a matter of fact, buys in a free-trade market. There is free trade absolutely in all this 3,000,000 square miles of territory. The farmer in Missouri who buys an implement made in Illinois buys it absolutely free of tariff. There is no tariff on articles brought from Illinois into Missouri. Most of the articles consumed by our farmers are made in this country, bought and sold here, and without reference to the tariff; but if the tariff were taken off of meats, farm implements, and flour that come into this country from Canada it would not in the least affect the price of these articles to our own people. If this is true, and I do not see how it can be otherwise, there is no unfairness in leaving it on. But it is said it is a discriminaton between people of our own country, and that if the farmer does not have protection then the manufacturer should not have it. If taking it off would not affect the price, then no actual injury is being done by leaving it on. The Canadian manufacturer of implements or flour or the Canadian meat packer could not compete with our manufacturers, and to take the tariff off would not result in our farmers buying any of these products any cheaper than they do now. We would take the tariff off of these articles if Canada would, but not for the mere sake of appearances would I be willing to take it off if by so doing we would encourage the development of these plants in Canada or, rather, transfer our plants to Canada. From my present knowledge I am not in favor of putting the meat products of the world on the free list. That would be a positive injury to the farmer. I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to put meats on the free list, feeling that to do so would put not only Canadian meats on the free list but the meats of Argentina and all other countries. I do him the justice to say, however, that he did not think so, nor did he so intend it, but I feared it and, to be sure, voted against his amendment.

Our farmers are told it is a disadvantage to them to have their products free of duty while there is a duty on manufactured products, and it is said that the Canadian farmers can buy goods imported from England cheaper than our farmers can buy them, because the rate of duty is higher on goods brought into this country than into Canada, and a statement is sent out to the farmers purporting to prove this. Admitting that the rates of duty are higher on goods imported into this country than into Canada, our farmers do not have to pay the duty, because they do not buy the imported articles, while the Canadian farmer does have to pay the tariff, because he buys the imported articles. So that, as a matter of fact, the Canadian farmer is at a disadvantage as compared with our farmers. This is proved by the fact that we export to Canada much more of manufactured products than England. This is clearly shown by the following statement prepared by the State Department showing some of the rates and imports into Canada. It also points out actual misstatements sent out to the farmers by those claiming to represent them.

DUTIES ON MANUFACTURED ARTICLES USED BY CANADIAN AND AMERICAN FARMERS.

[Analysis of list presented by ex-Gov. N. J. Bachelder.]

The list of comparative tariff rates appearing on pages 26 and 27 of the Finance Committee's Hearings on Reciprocity, May 8, 1911, and frequently referred to throughout the hearings accorded the agricultural interests by the Finance Committee, not only state many rates with absolute incorrectness, but is based throughout on the assumption that Canada imports a majority of her manufactured goods from Great Britain under the British preferential rates of her tariff, whereas in many of the instances cited the bulk of the Canadian imports are from the United States and are taxed from 10 to 15 per cent higher than the rates set down under the heading "Canadian tariff."

The Canadian preferential rates given are not stated accurately. The lower grades of earthenware most used by farmers' families, such as rough tableware, crocks, churns, tiles, etc., enter when from England at 20 per cent; the 15 per cent rate stated applies only to the finer grades of tableware. Wire from Great Britain is dutiable at as high as 15 per cent, instead of only 10 per cent under No. 406 of the Canadian customs tariff of 1907, covering "wire of all metals and kinds not otherwise provided for." Twisted or clothesline wire is dutiable at 17½ per cent. Hats from Great Britain meet a rate of 22½ per cent instead of 20 per cent. It is true that a few fur hats are admitted at 20 per cent, but these are included with all other manufactures of furs in the import figures, the total reaching but $421,741 in value, while ordinary felt and straw hats entering at higher rates totaled $2,890,134. The 35 per cent rate given for sugar can not be found in the Canadian tariff law or derived from the Canadian import statistics. The preferential rate on refined sugar is 72 cents per 100 pounds, with 1 cent per 100 pounds additional for each polariscope degree over 88. The rate of 17½ per cent stated for carpets applies only to mattings and coarse fiber rugs, the rate on carpets being 25 per cent, and the value of these carpets imported by Canadians being more than four times that of the mattings and coarse fiber rugs imported by them. The rate quoted for dress goods is only applicable to such goods when imported in the unfinished state to be finished by Canadian manufacturers, such imports amounting to but $84,437. On the other hand, ordinary woolen cloths used for the making of dresses and clothing enter Canada from Great Britain at 30 per cent, and are imported to the value of $6,680,380, about one-fifth coming from countries other than England at 35 per cent. The British preferential rate on celluloid collars and cuffs is 25 per cent, while the list referred to states that no manufactures of celluloid from Great Britain are taxed more than 5 per cent. The rate on cement is 8 cents per 100 pounds, instead of 5 per cent, as stated; and this 8-cent rate is equivalent to approximately 25 per cent. Baskets are dutiable at 20 per cent instead of being free of duty. Rubber coats are dutiable at 22½ per cent instead of 15 per cent. Lead in pigs and blocks is dutiable at 10 per cent, in bars or sheets at 15 per cent, and in manufactured forms at 20 per cent, while the list states it as exempt from all duty.

United States tariff rates are in several instances incorrect. Our duty on tin plates is specific (1.2 cents per pound), and is equivalent to 42.33 per cent ad valorem instead of 45 per cent. The rate of 75 cents per 100 pounds for wire can apply only to barbed wire, and is equivalent to 7.77 per cent ad valorem. The total imports of sugar into the United States during the year ended June 30, 1910, were admitted at an average ad valorem rate of 52.78 per cent instead of the 80 per cent rate shown in the grange's list. Common or laundry soap, the grade referred to when the Canadian rate is stated at 65 cents per 100 pounds, enters the United States at 20 per cent instead of 50 per cent. Manufactures of celluloid enter the United States at 65 cents per pound plus 30 per cent, the duty being the equivalent of 55.45 per cent ad valorem in place of 60 per cent. Cement is dutiable at 8 cents per 100 pounds instead of 10 per cent. The American rate is identical with the Canadian preferential rate when the specific duty is compared, but on our imports of cement the rate figures to but 22 per cent, while on Canadian imports it figures to 25 per cent. Salt in bulk is admitted at 7 cents instead of 11 cents per 100 pounds, and about two-fifths of our imports enter at the lower rate. Figs are dutiable at 2½ cents per pound in place of 1 cent per pound plus 35 per cent. Jute bags are dutiable at seven-eighths cent per pound plus 15 per cent, which works out to 33.08 per cent ad valorem instead of 45 per cent as stated in the list. The 45 per cent rate applies to "all other" manufactures of vegetable fibers. Cotton thread enters at an average ad valorem rate of 32.18 per cent instead of at 45 per cent as listed. Our imports of gloves enter at an average ad valorem rate of 49.52 per cent instead of 60 per cent. The lower grades of earthenware, such as farmers use to a great extent, are dutiable at 25 per cent instead of 60 per cent. The maximum rate for hose is $2 plus 15 per cent per dozen pairs instead of $5 plus 55 per cent. Window glass enters at an average rate of 49.67 per cent instead of from 60 to 75 per cent. The average rate of glassware is $53.83 per cent instead of from 50 to 100 per cent. The average rate on clocks and watches is 35.58 per cent instead of 40 to 60 per cent. The rate on baskets is 35 to 60 per cent instead of 45 to 60 per cent.

The list under discussion is premised with the statement that "the greater part of the manufactured goods imported into Canada come from Great Britain" and that therefore "it is only fair to take the rates of duty on British goods as the standard of comparison with our (the United States) tariff rates." The official Canadian import statistics, however, show that the greater part of Canada's imports of many of the leading items listed comes from the United States and pays duties much higher than those stated for comparison. Nearly nine-tenths of the furniture purchased by Canada, for example, comes from the United States, and is dutiable at 30 per cent instead of 20 per cent as stated. Our own rate on furniture is but 35 per cent. Imports of furniture into Canada during the year ended March 31, 1910, were as follows:

From United States	$851,077
From Great Britain	89,196
From other countries	54,107
Total	994,380

Common or laundry soap, the grade to which the Canadian rate quoted applies, is bought by Canadians mainly from the United States, and is taxed $1 per 100 pounds instead of 65 cents. The $1 rate is equivalent to nearly 18 per cent ad valorem and the proper United States rate is 20 per cent, the 50 per cent rate being erroneous. Canadian imports were:

From United States	$191,404
From other countries	8,549
Total	199,953

Pianos bought by Canada come chiefly from this country and are taxed 30 instead of 20 per cent. The imports were:

From United States	$282,457
From other countries	14,521
Total	296,978

Stoves used by Canadians, when from abroad, are largely of United States origin, as the following import figures show, and enter at 25 instead of 15 per cent:

From United States	$480,927
From other countries	11,611
Total	492,538

The same is true as to sewing machines, the tax on the vast majority of imports being 30 instead of 20 per cent:

From United States	$303,699
From other countries	19,550
Total	323,249

Four-fifths of the tinware taken by the Dominion is from America, and is taxed at 25 instead of 15 per cent:

From United States	$232,071
From other countries	74,932
Total	307,003

Rubber boots and shoes entering from this country are taxed at 25 instead of 15 per cent, and our share in Canada's purchase is:

From United States	$113,956
From other countries	1,887
Total	115,843

Three-fourths of Canada's imports of clocks come from the United States, and most of the remainder from Germany at the same rate of duty, 30 instead of 20 per cent:

From United States	$294,982
From Germany	68,735
From other countries	49,417
Total	413,134

Two-thirds of Canada's imports of watches and parts of come from the United States at 30 per cent, and most of the remainder from Switzerland at the intermediate rate of 27½ per cent; the rate listed is 20 per cent.

From United States	$669,740
From Switzerland	264,541
From other countries	112,202
Total	1,046,483

Automobile farm trucks are mentioned. Automobiles are not distinguished by classes in the Canadian import figures, but the vast majority of all kinds comes from the United States at 35 instead of 22½ per cent.

From United States	$1,569,227
From other countries	162,988
Total	1,732,215

Out of $163,720 worth of figs imported by Canada only $10 worth enters at the 40 cents per 100 pounds rate quoted, the remainder being taxed 62½ cents per 100 pounds. The bulk of the dutiable wire imported by Canada is from this country. Nearly all of the lamp chimneys bought by Canada come from American sources and are taxed 32½ instead of 20 per cent, imports from the United States being $161,079 out of a total of $195,845. More than one-half of the oilcloths imported by Canada are from the United States and are dutiable at 30 instead of 25 per cent (the preferential rate should have been stated in the list at 20 per cent). Canada imports $709,502 of lamps, etc., from the world, and of these $548,861 are from the United States at 30 instead of 20 per cent. Nearly all of the axes and scythes bought by Canada are from this country at 22½ instead of 15 per cent. Nearly one-half of the hats imported by Canada are from America and dutiable at 35 instead of 20 per cent. About one-half of the agateware purchased by the Dominion is also from this country, and is taxed at 35 per cent instead of at the 22½ per cent rate given in the list presented by Ex-Gov. Bachelder.

I hope our farmers, especially, will notice the very common manufactured articles that their Canadian neighbors buy from our manufacturers and upon which they actually, and not theoretically, pay a duty.

Because no great hope is held out that food products will be cheaper to the consumer if this legislation is passed it is asked: Are we to enact it simply on the ground that it will cement the friendly relations already existing between the Dominion and the United States?

That is a worthy object, and would alone justify its enactment, assuming that it would do no great material injury to our own industries and people, and it appeals all the more strongly to me because I believe it will be of great material benefit to our industries and to our people. Former President Roosevelt considers the establishment of the closest relations of good will and friendship with Canada a good and sufficient reason for this legislation. In his address at the nineteenth annual Lincoln Day banquet at Grand Rapids, Mich., February 12, 1911, he said:

> Here, friends, in Michigan, right on the northern frontier, I have the peculiar right to say a word of congratulation to you and to all of us upon the likelihood that we will soon have closer reciprocal tariff and trade relations with the great nation to the north of us. And I feel so pleased primarily because I wish to see the two peoples, the Canadian and the American peoples, drawn together by the closest ties, on a footing of complete equality of interests and mutual respect. I feel that it should be one of the cardinal policies of this Republic to establish the very closest relations of good will and friendship with the Dominion of Canada.

This legislation may not result in cheaper products to the consumer. Lower prices to the farmers themselves for their products would not appeal to me at all. The farmer does not now receive that proportion of the price paid by the ultimate consumer that he should receive. The cost to the consumer is often the result of speculation, manipulation of markets, and corners perfected and carried out in distributing centers by those into whose hands these products come after leaving the farmer. These manipulations, speculative prices, and corners may be to a certain extent restrained and prevented by bringing into these distributing centers the products of Canada, and to a greater or less degree bring lower prices to the consumers without injury to the farmers. The material benefit that will grow out of this legislation will be the greater trade of all kinds between the two countries. Trade begets trade, and while our trade with Canada now is very satisfactory, and while we are selling to her twice as much as she buys from us—that is, each Canadian buys $30 worth to $15 by each of us—we can not hope for this condition to continue indefinitely. Nations are much like individuals, and we may expect to see Canada, if this legislation is defeated, take steps to open up a greater trade with the mother country. If this legislation passes, we will not only continue to sell her twice as much as we buy, but our aggregate trade will increase amazingly.

Is there anyone who would have the hardihood to say that the settlement and development of any one of our great border States or of all of them has been anything but a blessing to the rest of the Republic? Who is there who would have any one of these States cut off from the rest? Would any Senator or Representative from the State of Minnesota agree that that State, with her beautiful lakes, groves, and rivers, her broad fields and prosperous homes, her busy factories and thriving cities, and her hardy, industrious, and progressive people, could be isolated from the rest of the Union without great injury to both? I venture not. Canada is but a continuation of Minnesota, North Dakota, and the other border States. There is nothing but an imaginary line between. Why not continue the development of these States on beyond this imaginary boundary? I can see nothing more desirable and nothing more beneficial to these border States and to this Union than to witness the cultivation of these broad acres, the building of beautiful and comfortable homes, the construction of a network of transportation, telegraph, and telephone lines, the erection of schoolhouses, churches, and the growth of towns and cities peopled by thousands, yes, millions, of vigorous, active, ambitious, and progressive people, buying and selling and trading with us freely as friends and neighbors. Their prosperity will be our prosperity and their happiness will be our happiness. Dollars and cents can not measure the benefits from such a development, and only the imagination of the poet can grasp the outline of these tremendous possibilities, and when this free intercourse comes, as come it will, and this growth comes, as come it will, our people and their people will wonder at the opposition to the consummation of such a glorious object.

I remember when great statesmen from Iowa and Indiana and other Middle Western States opposed the Government reclamation of arid lands on the ground that such reclamation would bring ruinous competition to their farmers. Their fears were groundless. Every acre of these lands so reclaimed and settled upon has added to the wealth of the Nation, has taken nothing from the farmers of those States, and has added amazingly to the market for eastern manufacturers. Identically the same results must come from the settlement and improvement of Canadian territory with reciprocity in trade.

Some one on behalf of the farmers has presented as an argument against this measure the slogan, "A tariff for one, a tariff for all." This is the very essence of the objection heretofore urged to the framing of tariff bills. It is the highest expression of bartering and trading that has been so persistently charged, and which has, in fact, been so little followed in preparing tariff legislation. If the need of protection rests on no better foundation than that, there is no excuse for it at all. The farmers of the country do not believe in and will not indorse this doctrine. If protection is needed, they want it, and ought to have it. If it is not needed, they do not want it simply because some other industry has it; nor will they indorse the threat to remove the tariff from other industries simply because they may even believe that they are treated unfairly, but because they know that such a course will do them great harm. Those who, in the discharge of their trust, may act on this theory will meet with the just condemnation of those whom they claim to represent when industrial ruin and disaster comes to them. Take the tariff off of manufactured articles simply because it is taken off of some agricultural products and the industrial ruin and havoc that will be the inevitable result will bring more harm and distress to the farmers than any other action we could take. I am in favor of taking the tariff off where it is not needed, whether from agricultural or manufactured products. I am not in favor of putting it on one article simply because it is on another. The farmers know that the substantial benefit that comes to them from the protective system is the domestic market that is built up for them. They know that prosperity in the manufacturing industries means prosperity to them, and they know that any policy that depresses the manufacturing industry injures them. Every additional man employed in manufacturing adds that much to the farmer's market and gives him a better price for his products. Destroy manufacturing by removal of tariff or otherwise and you destroy that market and bring low prices, poverty, distress, and mortgages to the farmer. The farmer's prosperity does not depend so much on the size of his crop as it does on the market. Destroy the market and he will not prosper, no matter how great his crop. For instance, in 1896 there were 150,000,000 farm animals in the country, valued at $1,700,000,000, while in 1910 there were 200,000,000, or only one-third more, but they were valued at over $5,000,000,000, or three times as much. I will join in taking the tariff off where I think it is not needed, but I will not join in taking it off in retaliation for some fancied or even actual wrong. To do so is to be untrue to my trust and to bring greater injury to those aggrieved.

This measure places rough lumber on the free list. As the lumber industry is one of the greatest, if not the greatest industry, in my State some may wonder why I do not oppose this measure. There is, however, a great difference in opinion among the lumber people of Washington as to the effect of this measure on the industry. Some are against it and some say it will do them no harm. Some of these latter may have lumber interests in Canada and may be influenced thereby, but others do not have such interests and they say they will not be injured by whatever Canadian competition may come from the passage of this measure. They assert that they are fully able to meet any such competition. My own opinion is that it is a matter of indifference to the lumber industry whether the present duty is retained or not. The tariff on lumber before the passage of the Payne-Aldrich Act was $2 per thousand, or only about 12 per cent on the average value of the lumber imported. This was not a protection to any material extent. It was largely a revenue tariff. The Payne-Aldrich Act reduced this tariff to $1.25 a thousand, or only about 7 per cent. This is no benefit as a protective duty. It is a revenue tariff pure and simple, and to take it off will do no more harm to the industry than has already been done. The people of the country are determined to have free lumber. If it does not come through this measure it will through another in the very near future, and, in my judgment, it will be better for the lumber-manufacturing business to have the matter settled so that they will know on exactly what basis they are to be, and be relieved from the continued agitation that has been affecting the industry for several years.

As I said, the present tariff does no good. If it has any effect it simply gives the retail dealer an excuse to hold up his price. The rough lumber is selling in the mills to-day in my State below cost. The lumber industry is demoralized in our section. This has not happened because of competition with Canadian lumber, but it is because of the fact that the people of the country have stopped building houses, fences, and bridges, and they have largely stopped repairing, so that there is no demand for rough lumber. The same is true of shingles. Two years ago the shingle industry was demoralized. We increased the tariff on shingles from 30 to 50 cents a thousand, but the industry to-day is in as bad a condition as it was then simply because we are not building enough houses to create the demand for shingles. Personally I should prefer to retain the present duty on shingles, but I can not help but believe that the passage of this bill will be a great benefit to the shingle and lumber industries. If this bill will have the effect that its opponents say it will I know it will be a great benefit. Canada is the mainstay of our lumber industry to-day. Lumber is higher there than in this country, and our lumber mills are shipping lumber into Canada now.

Mr. Bloedel, of Bellingham, Wash., one of the most intelligent, reasonable, and successful lumbermen of our State, testified before the Finance Committee with reference to the lumber conditions between this country and Canada, the present conditions of the market, and what the fears of the lumbermen are. He said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my closing remarks on Monday I touched upon the fact that lumber was higher at the present time in Canada than in the United States. I referred more particularly to the lumber manufactured in British Columbia. I stated that my own firm is situated advantageously, with a view to shipping into Canada. It is just 20 miles south of the line, with a connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and therefore has facilities to distribute into Canada. We shipped last year about 800 cars into that territory. You may therefore ask the question, Why are we afraid of the removal of the protection? The reason is not that we are afraid of the immediate present; it is the future we dread.

For the immediate present the conditions are such that the demand in Canada for lumber is greater than their capacity to manufacture. The Province of British Columbia is as great, I think, as our northwestern group of States. I mean by that Washington, Idaho, a part of Montana, and Oregon; that is, our lumber-producing northwestern group. The lumber product of British Columbia has not yet been brought to a point where it is a large factor, even within itself. My latest data, and these are not very recent, show that the output of British Columbia was about 800,000,000 feet, I think, in 1909. That has not been increased since sufficiently to be a factor. It is only about one-tenth of the product of a similar area in the United States just south of the boundary, which, as I stated earlier in this hearing, was 7,500,000,000 feet for 1909.

The industry in British Columbia has only been scratched; it has not yet been developed. It has just been touched; and just as soon as you open to British Columbia the market of 90,000,000 people, free to them, that industry is going to be not only fully developed, but probably in danger of being, as it has been on this side of the line, overdeveloped. I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that the best lumbermen in British Columbia are not favoring this reciprocity pact, for the reason that they fear just this very thing. That will mean in the future that we will have the competition of the Canadian raw material, the Canadian cheaper cost of production, the Canadian cheaper cost of taxation, bearing no burdens of our Government, and with a free market of 90,000,000 people to supply.

British Columbia has a coast line of many thousands of miles. I would not venture to guess how many, but, as you know, the coast line of British Columbia, with its numerous islands, is vast. It must be over 20,000 miles. Mills can be developed along that coast line at any number of points. They have the Canadian Pacific Railway, which comes into the United States at different points; they have the Northern Pacific Railway; they have the Great Northern Railway; they have all the means of reaching our market that we have.

It is therefore evident that the condition which obtains to-day on account of the phenomenal prosperity of Canada and its lack of a sufficient and adequate supply of lumber is not one that will obtain a year from now, or two years from now, or later than that.

From this it will be seen that the real fear is as to the development of the lumber business in Canada in the future. While I would not feel like putting my judgment up against that of Mr. Bloedel, I do feel that our industry, developed as it is, ought to be able to keep pace with any development that will take place in Canada in that industry. Our industry needs a market right now, and Canada will furnish that market to our mills not only this year, but for several years to come, no matter what development may take place there.

The criticism is made, however, that the duties are not reciprocal. That is true. I wish that they were; but I am not going to oppose this measure simply because there is a difference in the tariff on finished lumber going into Canada from what the duty is on finished lumber coming into this country. As I said, if the development takes place in Canada that is predicted, it means development for our lumber and shingle mills. If people go into Canada they must be sheltered; they will build houses that must be shingled; and for some time, at least, the lumber and shingles will come from our mills, bringing to them business and good prices.

There is a widespread belief that we should have free lumber, because of the Lumber Trust. There may be lumber trusts in the country, but I am satisfied that there is no lumber trust among the lumber mills and lumber manufacturers of our State. We have thousands of lumber mills, operating absolutely independent of each other, and anyone can go to these mills and buy lumber at the same price at which it is sold to any other person. If any agreement as to prices exist, it is amnog the retailers or those handling the lumber after it leaves the mills. Those who expect cheaper lumber from the removal of the tariff will be mistaken. It will not be cheaper, and this fact might just as well be recognized first as last.

This measure is criticized, however, because the tariff is taken off of rough lumber and not entirely off of finished lumber. It could have been taken off of finished lumber just the same as off of rough lumber, but there would have been no reduction in price in either by reason of the removal of the duty, and it was thought best not to take it all off, in view of the fact that Canada would make no further reductions. Those who think taking the tariff off will reduce the price complain because it is not entirely taken off of finished lumber, and contend that the removal of the tariff from rough lumber is of no benefit to the farmer. If taking the tariff off will reduce the price, the removal of it from rough lumber is of more benefit to the farmer than taking the tariff off of finished lumber. Much of the lumber that goes into the farmer's house is rough lumber, and not finished. The great need for lumber for the farmers of this country is not the building of houses, because these are largely built, but it is for the building of barns, fences, repairs, and so forth, in which rough lumber is largely used.

Another reason given for the removal of the tariff on lumber is that it is in the interest of conservation. I believe in conservation just as strongly as any man, but I believe in the conservation that conserves and not the conservation that wastes. The man who professes to be for free lumber in the interests of conservation, in my judgment, overlooks the first principle of conservation, unless he believes that free lumber will enhance the value. If the tariff does not affect the price of lumber, taking the tariff off will not affect its use or conservation. If taking the tariff off lowers the price, it brings waste and not conservation. The best way to conserve any natural product is to make it valuable, and the higher the price of lumber the more it will be conserved—that is, the less it will be wasted. Gifford Pinchot says:

The lumbermen are right when they tell you that in times of high prices for lumber they do cleaner work in the woods and cut more timber from a given area than they do when prices are lower and only the best grades can be marketed. Low prices for lumber unquestionably increase waste. If the removal of the tariff had any effect on work in the woods, it would be to displace the lower grades of lumber now cut by our own mills, which must be either logged or left in the woods when the higher grades are taken out, and to that extent it would increase the woods waste in this country. The waste in logging is already enormous—several times larger than our importations from Canada. I do not believe that the increased use of Canadian wood under free lumber would equal the increased waste, and even if it did the larger danger from fire and the greater difficulties in the way of forestry which follow wasteful logging would probably more than offset the gain. In other words, the drain upon our forests would not be relieved by allowing Canadian lumber to come in free.

This principle applies to all natural products. The farmer conserves his corn by husking it close, gathering every nubbin, when corn is high in price; when it is low he is not particular. If potatoes are high in price, only the very smallest are left in the field; when they are cheap, however, you can mark the furrows across the field by those left upon the ground. So it is with lumber. When it is cheap, only the best is manufactured and more or less of the balance of the tree is left in the forest to rot and burn. If valuable, every part of the tree is used or conserved. I am not for this bill as it affects lumber because it will make lumber cheaper nor because it will promote conservation, but I am in favor of it because the present tariff is of no benefit, because it will be better for the business itself to have agitation stopped, and because the possible development in Canada will furnish a good market for our mills for many years to come, and in this way be a real and substantial benefit to the industry.

There is another industry in our State that protests against this agreement, and that is the fishing industry. I do not hear from the fishermen, but I do hear from the heads of our great fishing concerns. I can not believe that our canneries will be very greatly injured. I think they are able to hold their own with Canada, or the world, for that matter, and they will not be injured by this legislation.

The only other industry in our State that has any reason to fear is the farming industry. Our hay will not suffer, because Canada can not get into our markets unless hay gets to $25 or $30 a ton, as it did some years ago, and then we would have been glad to get it from any source. Many had to go without it, and stock starved for want of feed.

Our wheat farmers will not be affected, because their market is fixed almost surely by Liverpool or outside markets. Canada can not get into the local market, and our other markets are the markets of the world. We export our surplus, and transportation charges protect us from any substantial importation of Canadian wheat under any circumstances. If the contention of some is correct that the Canadian surplus will all come into our country, this may raise the world's price, in which case it would benefit our farmers by giving them a better price. So that solely from my State's standpoint I can not see any special objection to this arrangement. This, however, would not lead me to support it if I still thought it would work great injury to any other great section or industry. I think many of our farmers oppose it, not because of the injury it will do them, but because of the injury they think it will do to their fellow farmers elsewhere, because they base their opposition to it on reasons presented from New Hampshire based on conditions there. None of the arguments presented by those from the wheat States apply to our wheat farmers. Canada can not raise more wheat to the acre than we can; she can not raise more crops in succession than we can; she can not get into our markets; she is not at all a competitor with us except in the world's markets. I am glad our farmers are interested in their fellow farmers elsewhere, and I will protect them against any wrong I think may threaten them.

Fruit raising is one of our great industries, and our fruit raisers are universally in favor of this legislation. They believe it will open to them the great markets of the Northwest in Canada and result in much good. That their judgment is concurred in by prominent Canadians is shown by the following interview with Premier McBride, contained in a Seattle paper of January 28:

FEARS RESULTS OF RECIPROCITY—PREMIER M'BRIDE OPPOSES LOWERING OF THE TARIFF WALL—WANTS FRUIT PROTECTED—BRITISH COLUMBIA EXECUTIVE UNWILLING TO BRING PROVINCE INTO COMPETITION WITH AMERICA.

[Special to Post-Intelligencer.]

VANCOUVER, BRITISH COLUMBIA, January 27.

"While I do not wish to take an alarmist view of the reciprocity arrangements that have been laid before the house at Ottawa," said Premier R. McBride, of British Columbia, to-day, "it is abundantly evident from a perusal of the proposals that, if adopted, they will inflict very serious injury to this Province.

"Take, for instance, the free entry into Canada of fruit and dairy products and agricultural produce generally. This means an injury to the agricultural classes that will be most severe.

"In the first place, it will put the markets of the prairie Provinces largely in the hands of the Americans, who can, even under present conditions, compete there with our fruit growers and those in eastern Canada.

"In British Columbia the fruit industry, by a great effort, is being built up, and it must be remembered that in the States to the south, where the industry is an old-established one, with large areas of cleared land, it costs very much less to produce food.

"Times have been prosperous and the people contented, and the advantages to be attained by the proposed changes are, to my mind, wholly in favor of the United States. In Canada the effect will be to disorganize trade conditions, injure our industries and our Canadian lines of traffic for the benefit of Americans."

I have no doubt as to the correctness of this position; and if any such development in British Columbia as is anticipated takes place, the market not only for fruit, but for all farm products of the State of Washington, will be very largely increased.

The cry of special privilege has been so long and persistently made that the people are generally imbued with the belief that our legislation is controlled by the so-called "special interests" and framed for their benefit. I do not admit the justice of this complaint, but the confidence of the people in the devotion of their representatives to the best interests of the people as their honest judgment sees it is worth more to the Government and the people than any sum of money or the development of any line of industry. To bring to the people confidence in the honesty, integrity, and patriotism of their representatives is of the greatest consequence. I am convinced that the fundamental cause of the almost universal complaint of favoritism to special interests on the part of legislators and legislation has been the protective tariff system. This grows out of the attempt to adjust the principles of this system to various conditions and various industries. It has been and is difficult to determine exactly what is needed to promote any particular industry and protect it from undesirable competition from abroad, and so it is that inequalities may have arisen and more protection given to one industry or another than has been needed. The fundamental idea of the protective system, however, is that it is for the benefit of all the people, and that it is of greater real benefit to those who must depend upon their individual labor and individual efforts for a livelihood than to the man of wealth.

The idea of the protective system is that it is of greater real benefit to the laborer than to the employer, to the poor man rather than to the rich man, to the wage earner rather than to the wage payer. If, by the adjustment of tariff duties, foreign manufactured products are excluded from this country and their manufacture here encouraged, the real substantial benefit should and does come to the man who works, because upon his employment depends his ability to have the food that he needs, the clothing that he should wear, and the house in which he should live, with the furniture and comforts necessary to bring happiness to himself and family. An idle factory is more real injury to the man who has had employment in it than to the owner. If the factory is idle, the owner may not have his usual income, but nevertheless he has his comforts, his home to live in, and his pleasures, because he usually has other income and a credit on which he can draw. But the men who have worked for him and are out of employment not only have no work but they have no income, their wages have ceased, and with the stopping of their wages their ability to purchase the necessities of life for themselves and their families also ceases. They can not borrow on their ability to labor. Any legislation, therefore, that tends to throw labor out of employment, however much it may injure the capitalist and reduce his dividends, works a far greater injury upon the poor man, the laborer and his family, who are the first to suffer. This fact seems to be often overlooked, and in our zeal to take away the profit of the employer we forget the laborer and the wage earner.

The fundamental principle of the protective system is that it furnishes employment to the men who must work at good wages, and therefore brings substantial benefit to those in our country who need help. This has been the reason for my belief in protection, and when I do not believe this I shall abandon it.

Without reducing the wages of labor I have believed that the development of our industries and their diversification would result, in many cases, in furnishing our products to consumers at a lower cost than the foreigner would furnish them, and that has been the case in many things. And, while we talk of the high cost of living to-day, I venture to say that we can live cheaper to-day than we did 20 years ago if we lived in the same way. Manufactured articles are cheaper than they were then, and the ordinary manufactured articles are cheaper to-day at the factory than they ever were before. Last fall I went through some glassworks in Ohio, and I was told that tumblers, dishes, and all other forms of glassware were cheaper at the factory than at any previous time. I went through a granite-ware factory in West Virginia, and they told me the same thing. If the tariff affects the price, it is in the hands of the manufacturer. The increased cost of articles to-day, however, comes largely, and in many cases entirely, after they leave the producer and by reason of different methods of distribution.

Much is said in praise of the farmer and his industry. Agriculture is made the basis of our prosperity. We should give to it and those engaged in it special consideration, because if agriculture is stagnant and those engaged in it not prosperous, the whole country is affected thereby. This, in a measure, is true; but with equal justice can it be said if our manufacturing industries are depressed and our laborers are out of employment, then is there no prosperity for the agriculturist. As a matter of fact, as I before have said, the farmer's prosperity does not depend entirely upon large crops, but depends upon the market for those crops, and that market consists of the wage earners of the country. The millionaire is not the farmer's best customer. The man who tends the forge, hammers the steel, and blows the glass is the best customer the farmer has. He eats more beef, pork, mutton, cabbage, potatoes, and other farm products than the man of wealth. If the wage earners are not employed, if they are not earning, then the farmer has no market, and if he has no market he does not prosper. If the mills are closed and idle, it means disaster to agriculture. In 1896 we had large crops, but the farmer was not prosperous, and the slogan then was not "more crops," but "start the mills." This was true, and from that time to this, with the mills running day and night, labor has been employed at good wages and the farmer has been prosperous. There is a mutual dependence between the agricultural and manufacturing interests that must not be overlooked. Any attempt to prejudice the one against the other should be condemned, and legislation framed to injure one in order to benefit another should not be favorably considered for a moment. The interests of one are not antagonistic to the interests of the other, and each should be duly respected. Legislation in the spirit of revenge, to get even for some fancied wrong, will react manyfold. Those who threaten the manufacturing interests will do the farmer the greatest injury. If to take the tariff off closes the mills, the loss to the farmer by reason of the fancied increase in prices by the tariff will be as nothing to the decrease in the price he will receive for his produce.

If the application of the principles of protection, however, is going to undermine the confidence of the people in their representatives, if it is going to make one class feel that it has been discriminated against in favor of another class, if it is going to create suspicion and distrust and a feeling that favoritism is being practiced by legislation, if it is going to threaten the very existence of representative government, then it were better to discard the system and follow some policy against which such charges can not be made.

When Republicans argue that a protective tariff enables our manufacturers to increase the cost of their wares over and above the actual cost of production, and thereby unnecessarily impose burdens upon the great masses of the people; when Republicans charge their colleagues with favoring the "special interests" when voting for the rate of duty they believe to be necessary to protect our labor from foreign competition; when Republicans seriously charge that our tariff schedules are framed by and for special interests instead of to promote the general good; when Republicans assume that the principal interests of the country are not competitive, and arbitrarily add the tariff to their profits, we are at the parting of the ways. You can not defend the protective tariff in one sentence and denounce its application in the other and have the system long endure. You can not uphold a system and confess all the wrongs charged against it. If conditions have so changed that we can not apply the system justly, we would better abandon it. I am not prepared to say that that time has come. I am prepared to say, however, that we are not so helpless as we think; that we are better able to hold our own markets than ever before, are better prepared to meet our competitors in the world's markets, and that substantial reduction can be made in our tariff duties without danger of injury to our industries, and that if by so doing we can make the people feel that their representatives are in fact acting for their good, as they are, and silence this constant cry of "special privilege" and "special favoritism," it will be of immeasurable benefit to do it. If there is a deficiency in the revenues it can easily be made up by just and reasonable taxes. I would like to see the time come when we can safely go to a tariff-for-revenue-only basis. Then I would like to see us come to a system where the revenues are derived from the fewest possible sources, and from those sources best able to bear them. When we reach that basis we can give more attention to the science of government and less to the science of taxation in framing our legislation. Then we can pay more heed to the rights of man and not so much to the rights of the dollar. That is a goal much to be desired and one which we will ultimately reach, and this legislation is one of the steps on the road.

One good thing has come out of this legislation. The discussion of it has demonstrated that we are all dominated by the same motives, even though we may reach different conclusions in regard to legislation pending in this body. The impression has been created throughout the country that certain Members of Congress are actuated in their votes and conduct by the highest and most patriotic motives and purposes, while others, who have not agreed with them and who have taken a different course on legislative matters, have acted from other than patriotic motives and without a desire to benefit the people. Some have been classed as the champions of special interests, and they and their votes have been held up to public censure. Some have assumed to be the only friends of the people. Some have been held up as "progressives," others as "reactionaries." Some have been classed as "insurgents," others as "standpatters."

This session of Congress has demonstrated that there is more progress in the name "progressive" than there is in the action of "progressives." The people of this country should not judge their legislators except upon the basis of action from honest, sincere, and patriotic motives as against action based upon dishonest, insincere, and unpatriotic motives. If the so-called progressive and the so-called standpatter are actuated by the same motives and the same patriotic purposes, they are both real progressives, and the one is entitled to the confidence and respect of the people just as much as the other. The desire to promote the welfare of the people is the real basis of progression. On this basis I venture the assertion that there is no real difference among the Members of this body nor among the members of any party in this body. Former President Roosevelt, in a speech at Grand Rapids February 12 of this year, said:

> Now, friends, I want to say a word or two on the general principles of the progressive—the progressive Republicanism—of what I believe it especially stands for, and to illustrate just what I mean by an example or two. Fundamentally all we are striving to do is to apply the doctrines of Lincoln and the men of Lincoln's day to present conditions. Lincoln believed in human rights; he believed in the rights of man; he believed that normally and generally the rights of man and the rights of property coincided, and that the surest way normally to help the rights of man was to safeguard the property interests, but if there was a conflict he put the rights of man ahead of the rights of property. That principle was the principle the Republican Party was in part founded to establish.

The principles laid down in the foregoing are the principles of everyone in this body and the principles of every Republican in this body, and for this reason, no matter what may be the action of anyone upon particular legislation, the country has the right to know and to believe that whatever action is taken is taken with honest motives and patriotic purposes and in the hope and belief that such action will be fundamentally in the interest of the people. We all believe in human rights. We all believe in the rights of man. We all believe in the rights of man and the rights of property, and, in case of conflict, the rights of man will always be placed ahead of the rights of property by every man who occupies a seat in this body.

Some apparently have assumed that they are infallible; that their judgments can not be wrong; that those who differ from them are not true to the sacred trust reposed in them, and thus it is that the country has been led to believe that those who do not agree with some of our statesmen must be mistaken and, not only mistaken, but that they must be intentionally wrong. This impression has become so strong that there is much amazement in the country at the attitude of some of those who have heretofore been especially considered as the friends of the people, champions of human rights, and the enemies of the "special interests." I am not astonished that there is much surprise expressed at the action of some of our "progressive" friends, and nothing has brought their attitude out more strikingly than the discussion of this measure. Nor am I surprised at their strenuous efforts, by iteration and reiteration, to make the people believe that they are still progressive while standing pat.

In its editorial of February 25, 1911, discussing the action of Republicans in the House of Representatives upon the passage of the reciprocity measure, the Outlook expressed its amazement as follows:

> That most of the "progressive" Republicans should find their place with the "standpatters" seems disconcerting.

Some of our progressive friends have been chided for their apparent reactionary affiliations. For instance, the Spokesman-Review, of Spokane, of March 17, in an editorial approving the stand taken by the President, said:

> It would have been well for the standpat element in the American Senate and for the special interests if they had been able to take the same high level. Their hesitation, reactionariness, and refusal to enact reciprocity have cost them dear in the esteem of the people.

It is rather harsh to have this stanch friend of "progressives" refer to them as "the special interests," because I do not know to whom else it refers.

If you read the discussions in another body you will often find our "progressive" friends referred to as "standpatters" and "reactionaries." I really think there is much reason for this. I have rather objected to the assumption that only a certain class are really "progressive," and that only those who see fit to qualify their Republicanism by prefixing the word "progressive" have the right to consider themselves as real progressives. Last Congress those who acted with certain great leaders of the Republican Party were denounced and held up to scorn and ridicule as "reactionaries," as "standpatters," as the friends of "special interests." Many of them were denounced by name as unfaithful to the principles and policies of the founders of the Republic and the Republican Party; and notwithstanding the fact that under their leadership our party had gained the particular appellation of the "Grand Old Party," it was constantly proclaimed that these men and these leaders were no longer true to the people, but were to be feared, condemned, and cast aside dishonored and disgraced. Men were elected to Congress on this cry and this platform and heralded as "progressives" and the friends of the people, and, strange to say, these same men have been found sitting at the feet of the men who in the campaign they so loudly and vehemently denounced. They have voted with them, acted with them, and apparently accepted their views as their own. Is this progression or reaction? It appears to me to follow the old philosophical rule that reaction is equal to action and in the contrary direction. Are these tried leaders wise, honest, and patriotic when they agree with the self-proclaimed "progressives," and unwise, dishonest, and unpatriotic when they do not happen to agree with them? It simply shows that men here act as they believe to be right, and that is why the people should know and understand that the men who were denounced before the people were just as honest and patriotic and just as progressive as those who denounced them.

In this body, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was under discussion, some made it a rule to support every reduction made in the House bill and to oppose every raise proposed in the Senate until the products of their own States were reached. When the bill was completed they would not support it, because it did not go as far as they thought it ought to go. They voted against the bill and all its progressive features and proclaimed themselves the only real friends of the people and enemies of the interests, while those who voted for the bill were denounced on every hand as the enemies of the people and the friends of the interests. They were progressive until the final vote came and then they stood pat, they reacted, and because the bill did not go as far as they thought it should, they refused to progress at all.

Now, here is a bill passed by the House of Representatives, in which every item is a reduction as far as it goes, and yet we find our "progressive" friends violently opposing it and joining hands with those heretofore denounced as "reactionaries." I hardly know where I am. During the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill I began to doubt some of the views I held in regard to protection as I saw them applied in the actual preparation of the tariff law and I began to feel they would stand some modification. On several very important matters I voted with my "progressive" friends, believing them to be in the right. When the bill was entirely completed it was not in all respects satisfactory to me, but I honestly believed it to be an improvement over the Dingley law as applied to present conditions. There were many things in the act that I considered of great importance and of real progress and so I voted for the bill, because I believed it was a better bill as applied to the present conditions than the Dingley law, and I believed it to be a step forward. I believed I was a progressive, and since the passage of that law I have studied conditions pretty carefully and have been prepared to take a step farther forward as a Republican and as believing that the Republican Party is the party of progress and that Republicanism means progression. Of course, I expected those who have especially proclaimed their progressiveness to be in the forefront. I expected them to be sounding their battle cry of progress. I expected to see their tomahawks flashing amidst tariff duties and slashing them off wherever opportunity offered. I indeed find them in the forefront, but in the forefront of the "standpatters" and "reactionaries," so called. They have again reacted and are standing pat. Progressives seem to be those who will not go forward unless they can go just as far as they want to go. If they can not do this, they react and stand pat. Thus are they the real "standpatters" the real, genuine "reactionaries." "Standpatters," heretofore so called, appear to be those who, if they can not have all they think is right, will take as near it as possible and move forward with the majority. They are in fact the "progressives" and the real "progressives." They move forward surely and sanely, and they are the ones who have made the real progress of history. There is not much noise or blare of trumpets or newspaper notoriety in connection with their progression, but they place on the statute books legislation under which the people move forward and prosper. The fact that our "progressive" friends are now real "stand-patters," that they are now real "reactionaries," does not signify that they are less devoted to the people's interests than heretofore. It simply means that their honest judgment of what is right coincides with the honest judgment of those who heretofore have been regarded by the party with disfavor and emphasizes the need of a more tolerant spirit in the country and among Republicans. It simply emphasizes what every man ought to know and what every man here ought to say—that every Member of Congress in his action is moved by the highest principles of duty and honor and the patriotic desire to do that which is for the best interests of the people and his country.

The Republican Party has been successful during the last 16 years because it has been united, harmonious, and moved by a common purpose. We need that harmony and common purpose now. We need more concessions and more working together as Republicans for the welfare of the party rather than as this or that kind or class of Republicans. I am willing to work under the banner of Republicanism for all that is good for the people and for the country, and I am no less progressive than those who insist upon being called progressives. If we will fight our battles and adjust our differences as Republicans, we will serve our party best and serve our country best.

Mr. President, this legislation is a long step toward full and free intercourse with the magnificent people on the north. It will injure no industry here, but will stimulate all. It will not decrease the price of wheat, but should give us better and cheaper flour. It will enlarge and expand our markets for our horses, cattle, and hogs, and should give us cheaper meats, bacon, and hams. It should widen our market for our manufactured products, thereby giving more employment to labor and increasing the domestic demand for farm products. It adds to the total of our internal trade the trade and commerce of a territory as great as our own, to be peopled and developed by men and women of the same race, character, needs, desires, hopes, ambition, and destiny as our own and whose trade is far more desirable than that of many times the same number of people of any other race or clime. It extends to this people and this territory that wise principle of unrestricted trade which the founders of the Republic with such sagacity applied to the States of the Union, and we can confidently look for the same results. It insures perpetual peace between the two peoples and countries and insures to them a common destiny under different flags and government. Side by side in open and equal rivalry in commerce, education, science, civilization, and good government will the two peoples work out their destinies, bringing to each the blessings of prosperity and good government. The phantoms and ghosts of evil that have been conjured up will become ridiculous as the years roll on, and our people will bless the statesmanship that had the foresight, the courage, and the wisdom to present and press this beneficent measure to its final passage. With the same conscientious solicitude for the welfare of our people that animates any Senator who opposes this measure, I shall vote for its passage.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when this bill was reported to the Senate, toward the close of its last session, I stated my objections to it, but I did not elaborate them, because I felt morally certain that we would not reach a vote on it before the adjournment of that Congress. I have also pointed out, in several running debates during this discussion, what I consider some of its most obnoxious features; but in view of the general favor with which it has been received by the public and in view of the decisive majority by which it will pass the Senate, I feel obliged by a sense of duty to my constituents as well as by a proper respect for my associates, to state more fully than I have heretofore done the reasons which compel me to vote against it.

In the first place, it is my conviction that these trade agreements must more or less interrupt our friendly commercial relations with all countries which are not parties to them; because nations, like individuals, resent any arrangement which discriminates against them. I believe that special favors to particular nations are as certain to breed international resentments as special favors to particular classes are to breed dissatisfaction among our own people; and it is this belief which induces me to think that the true policy of this Government is to cultivate a liberal commercial intercourse with all countries, neither extending preferences to some nor practicing discriminations against others. I might distrust my own conclusion on this subject if it did not accord with the greatest state paper ever promulgated by the first President of this Republic, who was a most unselfish patriot as well as a most sagacious statesman. Among the many wise admonitions in Washington's Farewell Address, one of the wisest was that which counsels us to pursue a commercial policy with all nations which "should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither granting exclusive favors nor preferences to any"; and if I sought a more modern support for my opinion, I can easily find it.

In 1896 the House of Representatives directed its Committee on Ways and Means to investigate and report upon the subject of reciprocal trade agreements. The majority of that committee gave its cordial indorsement to that policy, and every Republican member of the committee, together with two Democrats, signed that report. The two Democrats who joined the Republican majority were the Hon. Seth Cobb, of Missouri, and the Hon. John L. McLaurin, of South Carolina. The minority of the committee, however, strongly dissented from the conclusion of the majority and stated their views in a paper of admirable force and clearness. That paper was prepared by the Hon. Henry G. Turner, who then represented a Georgia district in the House of Representatives, and I need not tell those who knew him that he was one of the ablest men, as well as one of the soundest Democrats, who has occupied a seat in that body for many years. The Hon. Benton McMillin, of Tennessee, and the Hon. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama, concurred in the views expressed by Mr. Turner, and though a minority of the whole committee, they constituted a majority of its Democratic membership. After reviewing the question at some length, they stated their conclusions; and the last in order, though, in my opinion, the first in importance, of those conclusions was this:

> That uniform rates of duty, applying equally to the products of all nations, is the only safe policy to pursue, as it can give occasion to no complaints of unfair treatment, such as must arise under a scheme of discriminating duties.

Not only, Mr. President, must the preferences extended to the contracting country by these trade agreements necessarily involve offensive discriminations against all other countries, but they must also in the very nature of things limit our power to deal with tariff duties in the manner which we may deem most equitable to all sections and to all classes of our own country. Nothing could better exemplify this essential and unavoidable vice of such arrangements than the bill now under consideration. No man will attempt to maintain before this Senate that it is just and fair to the farmers of this country to repeal the duty on the wheat which they sell, and still leave a duty on the flour which they buy; but that unfair and unequal provision is excused upon the ground that while Canada was asking us to open our markets to her wheat, she was not willing to open her markets to our flour, and thus the determination of a foreign country to protect her millers is offered as an excuse for the manifest injustice which we are about to inflict upon the largest and the most deserving class of our people. All men admit the injustice, and I might well say the absurdity, of free cattle and taxed meat; but we are told that it could not be avoided because while Canada was more than anxious for free trade in cattle, she was not willing to expose her newly established packing houses to our competition in her meat markets. I could say as much, and even more, with respect to some other articles embraced in this agreement, but these two are sufficient to sustain my assertion that these trade agreements compel the adjustment of our tariff duties according to the views of another nation rather than according to our own sense of justice. Indeed, sir, it was not necessary for me to resort to the bill itself to enforce that objection, because the President has said, in effect, on more than one occasion that these inequalities can be found in the agreement because Canada would not consent to their correction.

Another, and to my mind a most serious, objection to these special trade agreements is that they render it impossible for any party to deal with customs duties consistently with its theory of the tariff question. The Republican Party professes to deal with the tariff as a system of protection, and the Democratic Party professes to deal with it as a system of revenue; but this bill does not square with either theory, for it deprives certain industries of every semblance of protection and it transfers to the free list articles which fulfill the Democratic definition of a revenue duty more perfectly than any others which are imported into this country. It compels the Republican Party to abandon protective duties in some cases, and to accept revenue duties in their stead; it compels Democrats to abandon revenue duties in some cases and to accept duties which increase the manufacturer's protection even beyond that afforded by the existing law. These incongruous provisions have provoked some Republicans to denounce it as a Democratic measure, and have provoked some Democrats to denounce it as a Republican measure. The truth of the whole matter is, Mr. President, that it is neither Democratic nor Republican, but it is a strange compound of both which renders it neither. I am willing to concede that it is the best which, under all the circumstances, the President could secure; but, sir, those who affirm that to be true only make it plainer that when we come to trade markets, it is impossible for us to trade on terms which are just to our own people, or even consistent with the opinions of those who must conduct the negotiation.

FARMS SACRIFICED TO CITIES.

But, Mr. President, even if I were not opposed to these special trade agreements upon general principles, I could not support the one now pending here, because it deliberately sacrifices the interest of our farms to reduce the cost of living in our cities. It goes far beyond the doctrine of free raw materials, which has been the subject of controversy for so many years, for it not only confers certain advantages upon our manufacturers, but it extends special favors to the people of our cities and industrial centers by reducing the prices which they would otherwise be compelled to pay for the produce of our farms and ranches. It would be well within the truth to say that the policy embodied in this measure is designed to supplement the policy of free raw material, and that the two are hereafter to make common cause against the farmers of this land. Our manufacturers can see the end of the high protection which they have so long enjoyed, and with a shrewdness for which they have become proverbial they have set about to so shape the change that they will not suffer any loss. They perfectly understand that free raw material will reduce the cost of manufacturing their goods almost or quite as much as a reduction in the duty on them will reduce their selling price, thus leaving their profits undiminished; but they are not satisfied to maintain their profits, and they are endeavoring to increase them. They intend to use the reduction of the duties on their finished products as a pretext for reducing the wages of their employees, and they hope to reconcile those employees to lower wages by a reduced cost of living, to be accomplished by this and similar measures to follow, if the country ratifies this one. If they succeed in this plan, the sum of it all will be that neither the manufacturer nor his employees will be compelled to surrender any real advantage which the tariff now gives them, while the farmers and other producers of raw material will be compelled to lose whatever is saved to all other classes.

OBJECT OF THE BILL.

I know that many supporters of this bill now hope to escape the wrath of the farmer and the ranchman by denying that the purpose of it is to reduce the price of farm and ranch products; but, sir, I will demonstrate before I conclude that whatever may be the denials or protestations here, such is its purpose, and I think I can also demonstrate that such will be its effect. I shall not ask the Senate, and I shall not ask the country, to accept my statement as to the object of this legislation; but I can fully establish what I have averred against it at least in that respect, by what its own proponents and supporters have said in its behalf. I will first present what was said by the President of the United States in his message transmitting this agreement to Congress. In that document he assumed, as a matter not in doubt, that the agreement was designed to reduce the cost of living and specifically stated where the reduction was to be expected in these words:

> Reciprocity with Canada must necessarily be chiefly confined in its effect on the cost of living to food and forest products. The question of the cost of clothing as affected by duty on textiles and their raw materials, so much mooted, is not within the scope of an agreement with Canada, because she raises comparatively few wool sheep, and her textile manufactures are unimportant.

The President there plainly indicates that, so far as this treaty is expected to reduce the cost of living, it was intended to make the reduction on farm and forest products. In the same message, and preceding what I have just read, the President also says:

> I do not wish to hold out the prospect that the unrestricted interchange of food products will greatly and at once reduce their cost to the people of this country. Moreover, the present small amount of Canadian surplus for export, as compared with that of our production and consumption, would make the reduction gradual.

Thus we have not only the distinct admission that whatever effect this treaty will produce upon the cost of living will be confined to farm and forest products; but we also have the distinct assertion that though the reduction will not be great and immediate it will be gradual and permanent. It is true that after the farmers of the country rose up in angry protest against this injustice the President has somewhat modified that opinion, and he now declares, or in his latest speech delivered at Indianapolis he declared, that the reciprocity agreement will produce little, if any, effect upon the cost of living.

The Senator from New York in his very able and carefully prepared address to the Senate goes even beyond the President's message and seeks to justify this effort to reduce the price of farm products. He does not, it is true, attempt to justify it by an argument, but he declares that the public mind is so fixed in its determination to have cheap food that Congress would be compelled to respond to that demand in some other bill, if this one had never been submitted to us. Frankly admitting that the tariff on agricultural products has not heretofore been of any real benefit to the farmer, he boldly declares that as we have now reached a stage in our national development where tariff duties will enhance the price of agricultural products, they must be repealed, so as to prevent that result. In order that all who hear me or who may read what I am saying can understand what the Senator from New York thinks on this precise question, I will read an extract from that part of the speech in which he discussed it. This is what he said:

> I wish to say one word further with special reference to the effect of this law upon the farmer. If I were at home I would say it in private conversation to my farmer friends about me in the country, and that is this: The taking off of the duty on farm products between this country and Canada, while it will in a technical sense, a strict sense, be accomplished by the passage of this bill, nevertheless was inevitable; and if it did not come in this bill it would come in its own way by ordinary tariff legislation.
> No one can mistake, no one ought so to blind himself as to mistake, the changed feeling of the people of this country regarding the tariff as exhibited by the election of last fall, and not only by the election of last fall, but exhibited in 10,000 expressions all over the country and exhibited in the highest degree by the possibility of this reciprocal arrangement.
>
> No one may suppose that this arrangement could be made by the President, carried through the House, certain of passage here in the Senate, if there were not a great public opinion behind it. What we say here is of little consequence. Our arguments do not advance or retard it. It is moving along with a public opinion behind it.
> Mr. President, there is no one here who believes that there is the least possibility that the people of the United States, until another revolution of sentiment has come, will permit the cost of their living to be increased by the imposition of a duty on ordinary foodstuffs.

At this point in his speech I interrupted the Senator from New York to ask why the people should demand untaxed food any more than untaxed clothing, as the one was no more a necessary of life than the other, and he answered in these words:

> Clothing does stand on a little different footing with regard to the general principle, because it is an illustration of the original idea that it was desirable for the country to have manufactures.

To that answer I replied then, as I do now, that the real reason for applying one rule to the farm and another to the factory is due to an apprehension that the factory will close whenever its dividends disappear, while they know that the farm must be cultivated whether it returns a profit to its owner or not; and to that suggestion the Senator from New York made this rejoinder:

> Mr. President, I have stated my view regarding the inevitable result of the process which is now going on upon the system of food duties. I never have thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer. They have been quite indifferent, affecting only several localities here and there, so long as our production ran far ahead of our consumption. But with the increase of our cities as compared with our farming population and the using up of our waste lands and the fencing in of old cattle ranges and the reduction of the productive power of our land, we have about come to the point where the continuance of those duties, instead of being a matter of indifference to the people of the country, would result in putting up the cost of food.
> I am not arguing the question. I am simply stating a reason why the farmers should not consider that this reciprocity arrangement is doing them any particular harm, because it is something that is sure to come to them anyway.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is regarded by many as the spokesman of the present administration, while denying in one part of his speech that this bill will reduce the price of agricultural products, except as to particular articles and over limited areas, made it plain in another part of his speech that he agrees with the Senator from New York in thinking that the farmers should be compelled to furnish cheap bread and cheap meat to the cities, although the cities are not compelled to furnish cheap implements and cheap clothing to the farms. He entertained the Senate with an interesting historical account of governmental control of food products, and concluded it with this declaration:

> Passing by many other instances of the insistence of a people upon maintaining its grain supply, we may come to England, where in 1846 Sir Robert Peel turned his back on the policies of a lifetime and brought into Parliament a measure for the repeal of the corn laws, which opened the markets of England to the food supply of the world. This law became fully effective in the year 1849.
> There are certain articles of food which may be classed as luxuries which are not of such vital importance, but if the time is coming in the United States when, instead of cheaper food, the cost will exceed that in other countries, we must count on a revolutionary change which will not merely affect our industrial situation, but will affect our political situation as well. Therefore I desire now to enter my protest against any policy which looks to the maintenance of duties on the most essential foods—the bread and the meat which the people eat—when the home supply shall prove insufficient. Such a policy, to my mind, is little short of suicidal. Progress and prosperity alike are impossible without an abundant food supply.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] knows as well as I do, and I regret that he did not have the candor to say so to the Senate, that when "Sir Robert Peel turned his back on the policies of a lifetime and opened the markets of England to the food supply of the world," he also opened the markets of England to the factory products of all the world. If the Senator from Ohio and his political associates are ready to propose as the law of the United States the same kind of a bill which Sir Robert Peel carried through the British Parliament, I am ready to join them; but, sir, I will never agree to apply the doctrine of Peel to the farms and apply the doctrine of Henry Clay to the factories of this country.

But, Mr. President, while the opinions of the President, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] are entitled to the highest consideration, I have another authority which, with all deference to them, is more controlling than anything which they have said. In March, 1910, the Legislature of Massachusetts appointed a commission to inquire into the causes of the high cost of living. I do not have the honor of a personal acquaintance with the members of that commission, but we must assume that they possessed a peculiar fitness for the work, or else they would not have been selected for it by the legislature of that ancient Commonwealth, and if more were needed to attest their character and standing, it could be found in the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has thought that report of sufficient importance to have it printed as a public document by the Senate of the United States. It is interesting in many respects, but for the purpose which I have in hand this afternoon I need only to direct the attention of the Senate and of the country to that particular part of it which advocates Canadian reciprocity as a means of reducing the cost of farm products. This report does not call them farm products, nor did the Senator from Ohio when he was denouncing every law which might increase their cost. This report, like the Senator from Ohio, refers to these articles as food products, because that will not make the matter so plain or so repugnant to the farmer; but they are farm products none the less, and whether we employ one description or the other, the fact remains the same. I ask the special attention of all Senators to that portion of the report which I will now read:

> Massachusetts comes far from feeding itself. In consequence of our extremely small percentage of agricultural workers and the excess of population in proportion to available farm land, the State is mainly dependent on outside sources for its food supply.
> If, then, we are sure to buy from two-thirds to five-sixths of our food from producers at a distance; if by no possibility we can get whatever advantage might arise from relying on our own farmers to come anywhere near feeding us, no obligation prevents us from seeking to buy in the cheapest market available, unless it be found among the reciprocal obligations of the tariff system.
>
> But the tariff was never meant to apply seriously to the food of the people, save for the development of such industries as the growing of fruit in Florida or beets for sugar in the West. From the first it was designed to create and preserve manufacturing industries. The odium of the corn laws need but be suggested to show how obnoxious would be a serious tax on food. If we have reached the point where it is of real importance to us to have the product of the farms of the North as well as that of the farms of the West, no tariff hindrance can be endured.
>
> It is not probable that any relatively considerable part of the product of our Massachusetts agriculture now marketed and not consumed on the farm would come in competition with foreign produce were our markets opened to all comers.
>
> So the Massachusetts farmer has nothing to lose from such a course, but on the contrary, has much to gain. Our physical limitations and the competition of mill and factory for the available help make it sure that he can at best not more than furnish a quarter or a third of our food. His nearness to the market makes it certain no remote competitor can undersell him on that part of our food which he can most profitably produce.
>
> As to the rest he will benefit in common with all other consumers. He has as much to gain as anybody from the grain that will henceforward in ever-growing flood come from the vast prairies of the Canadian northwest. It will feed his poultry and fatten his cattle. It will help revive the dairy, which ought to be his mainstay; will make it cheaper for him to work the market garden, and will develop the orchard.
> Extension of Canadian reciprocity in the matter of manufacture is, in our belief, for the present out of the question. The forces now dominant in Canada would not listen to any proposition that would endanger her growing industries, and there is no reason why they should. It is not for the United States, the majority of whose citizens are confident of the worth of the protective system in developing manufactures, to begrudge her neighbor the benefits of this same system.
> There was a time when Canada might have been willing to have her textiles made in Manchester, England, or Manchester, N. H. That time has passed. We are not likely again to get on a footing where a bargain is possible until the Canadian factories feel equal to self-reliance. Meanwhile it is of the utmost importance to maintain amicable relations, under which each party can from time to time make concessions and extend reciprocal relations without loss of either advantages or of dignity, as has recently been so admirably illustrated.
> These will at least not be discouraged if we can make it possible for our people to buy their food in the cheapest market. If Canada chances to profit by supplying our needs to some small extent, so much the better both for Canada and for ourselves. But there is no reason why we should restrict our new purchases to Canada. If Mexico, or Argentina, or Australasia can help us out, let us turn to them as well.

Here, Mr. President, we have a distinct and unequivocal declaration in favor of cheap food products, and a reciprocity agreement with Canada is recommended as a first step toward procuring them. The gentlemen who wrote that report were under no political temptation to conceal their object or to palter with their constituents in any double sense about it. They were speaking for a State whose rural population is but an inconsiderable per cent of the whole, and they did not hesitate to plainly avow their purpose and point out the way to accomplish it. They did, it is true, offer some consolation to the farmers of Massachusetts by assuring them that they would share the general benefit which Canadian reciprocity would bring to that State through the lower prices at which they could obtain certain farm products which the necessity of their situation now compels them to buy from their brother farmers of the West.

It will be observed by those who have listened closely to what I have just read that these Massachusetts advocates of cheap living are not content with the lower price of farm products which Canadian reciprocity promises them, but they look beyond Canada to Mexico, to Argentina, and even to far-off Australia. Her citizens have grown rich by taxing the shoes, the hats, and the clothes of the American farmer, but Massachusetts now declares with an arrogant selfishness that the Government must allow them to buy their farm products in the cheapest markets of the world, though she would still deny the American farmer the right to buy his manufactured goods under the same conditions.

Mr. President, I will tender one more witness to the fact that the purpose of this agreement is to reduce the price of farm products, and this witness is one who views the question purely from an industrial standpoint. A recent issue of Harper's Weekly printed an article on "The Business Side of Reciprocity," contributed by Mr. Franklin Escher, in which he cordially indorses this proposal and enumerates its general benefits, as well as its special benefits to particular classes. I shall perhaps have something to say later about those special benefits which he says it will confer on particular classes, but in this connection I shall only lay before the Senate what he says as to its purpose and its effect with reference to the price of farm products. Here is a part of what he wrote:

> Removal of the present duty on Canadian agricultural products can not but work toward a reduction in the cost of living. To a very much greater degree than most people think does the supply and demand for products of the soil influence the price of general commodities. Cheap wheat and oats and corn mean not only cheap beef and pork, but a lowering in the price of textiles and steel and every other kind of manufacture in whose cost of production wages are the chief factor. Wheat at a dollar and a quarter and corn at 70 cents mean high wages, and high wages mean a high cost of production. Get down the original cost of what comes out of the ground and the price of the other necessities of life will soon enough fall into line.

This writer thus lays the whole scheme bare and makes it evident to even the dullest man that the program is to first reduce the price of farm products and then to reduce the wages of industrial labor. They expect to pacify the laborer by showing him that he will take as much from the farmer when he purchases these agricultural commodities as the manufacturer will take from him by a reduction of his wages and therefore he will lose nothing in the end. In the closing paragraph of this same article the writer not only declares that the object of this treaty is to reduce the price of farm products, but he answers the farmer's remonstrance against it with a sneer and dismisses it with the statement that "the question is too big to be settled for the benefit of any one section or part of the country." This declaration is so novel and so brutal in its candor that I want the Senate to hear it. This is his language:

> That is exactly the object of this proposed reciprocity treaty with its provision for the free importation of Canadian wheat and other foodstuffs into the United States. By our farmers, naturally, the idea of Canadian competition with what they raise is not at all liked, but the question is too big to be settled for the benefit of any one section or part of the country. The time has come in the development of this country when the products of the soil are no longer sufficient to meet the needs of a fast-growing population and the necessity for opening the doors to the products of other countries has become urgent. It is the only way in which the rise in the cost of living can be stopped. And until the rise in the cost of living is stopped—not for six months or a year, but in such a way as to make it evident that the check is permanent—the root of the trouble remains and sustained financial recovery is impossible.

THE PRICE OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Against this accumulated evidence that our cities and our industrial centers are seeking to cheapen the cost of living by reducing the prices which they must pay for farm products, some Senators have opposed the naked assertion that tariff duties do not and can not affect the price of agricultural produce. The shortest, and perhaps the best, answer I could make to that argument would be to say that if a tariff can not help the farmer to realize a higher price for his products when he sells them, then it will not compel the consumer to pay a higher price for them when he buys them, and it is absolutely without effect either upon the producer or the consumer. Surely, sir, the American Congress will not waste its time in striving to repeal a tariff duty which does not constitute a tax upon any consumer or afford a protection to any producer. If it taxes no consumer, the Democratic Party is not required to insist upon its repeal; and if it protects no producer, the Republican Party should not insist upon its continuance. But, Mr. President, conclusive as that answer would be, I choose to meet the question in a different way; and I will show that while the price of some agricultural products can not be increased by a tariff duty, the price of others can be, and in making this argument I will not contravene anything which intelligent Democrats have ever said on that question.

It is undoubtedly true that all Democrats have contended that no tariff duty can affect the price of some agricultural products; and it is probably true that some Democrats have contended that no tariff duty can affect the price of any agricultural product. The latter view, however, has never been accepted by our party as a whole, or by individual Democrats of average intelligence. No man doubts that the price of wool is enhanced by a tariff duty; no man doubts that the price of sugar is enhanced by a tariff duty; no man doubts that the price of rice is enhanced by a tariff duty; no man doubts that the price of hides would be enhanced by a tariff duty; nor can any man who studies the question in all its phases doubt that the price of wheat is now enhanced by a tariff duty. No sensible Democrat has ever supposed that there is anything in the nature of agricultural products which renders their price less susceptible to the influence of a tariff duty than the products of a factory; and whatever we have said on that subject has been based upon the fact that as to certain agricultural products the ratio of our production to our consumption was such as to leave an immense surplus for which it was necessary to find a market elsewhere, and that the price of the entire crop was controlled by the price of the large surplus which it was necessary to export. The principle involved in that contention was sound then and it is sound now; but there has been such a radical change in the ratio of our production to our consumption that the argument based upon it is no longer applicable to the case. The advocates of this bill recognize this change in conditions as fully as I do, and they predicate their whole argument in favor of free farm products upon the very ground that the increase in our agricultural production has not kept pace with the increase in our consumption of agricultural products.

I understand as well as anybody that no tariff duty can affect the price of upland cotton, which is the great staple of the South, because we produce more than 60 per cent of the world's cotton crop and export more than 60 per cent of what we produce. With our exports practically double our consumption, the price of the whole crop must, of course, be determined by the export price. Neither could any tariff duty affect the price of corn, except under the most extraordinary conditions, because we produce 75 per cent of the world's crop, and we could easily spare more for export than the world is now ready to take from us. But, sir, outside of these two great crops, the price of almost every other agricultural product can be and will be affected by a tariff. The effect on some will be confined to a limited territory and the effect on others will be slight, but the price of all will be influenced at some place or in some degree by a tariff duty.

The President of the United States has given the sanction of his great name to the contention that the price of farm products is fixed in the markets of the world, and can not therefore be affected by any law of our Congress. I believe that I can show to the satisfaction of every open mind that the very argument which the President has made on that question really establishes the opposite of what he intended, and since he is the author of this agreement, as well as its most distinguished advocate, if I can show that his own argument supports my contention I can then well afford to pretermit an answer to my lesser critics.

In his Chicago speech President Taft replies with spirit, but still with a becoming dignity, to those who have accused him of making inconsistent arguments. He met the accusation in what I am sure he considered a fair way, and so that the Senate may judge whether his answer was sufficient, I will read it and then attempt to analyze it. This is what he said:

> I have been attacked on the floor of the House and elsewhere as occupying an inconsistent position. It has been said that I have urged the reciprocity agreement with the idea of lowering the cost of living on the one hand, and then have asserted that the farmers would not be injured by reduction in the price at which they sell their products on the other hand. It is asked, Is it possible to reduce the cost of living on the one hand and maintain the present prices of farm products on the other? My own impression is that the cost of farm products is determined by the world's supply, and not by local conditions of tariff or otherwise, and that as long as the movement toward manufacturing and away from the farms continues and the supply of farm laborers is reduced a continuance of high prices for farm products is inevitable. But I do think that reciprocity will enlarge the reservoir or the supply of farm products for our people, and thus prevent undue enhancement of prices beyond the present standard.

It will be readily perceived by the attentive reader that the President does not there deny that he has urged the reciprocity agreement with the idea of lowering the cost of living, or that he has asserted that the farmers will not be injured by a reduction in the prices at which they sell their products. Indeed, he inferentially admits having made both statements by endeavoring to show that they are not inconsistent; and in his attempt to do that he has uttered some of the most remarkable contradictions that ever fell from the lips of a great man in quick succession. "My own impression," says the President, "is that the cost of farm products is determined by the world's supply, and not by local conditions of tariff or otherwise." It is fortunate for the fame of the President that he stated that as an impression, for he thus exempts himself from a criticism which he would otherwise have invited. Had he stated it as a matured opinion or as a conviction, he would have convinced all men who understand the question that he had arrived at his conclusion either without a full knowledge of the facts or else by an illogical process of reasoning. It is also fortunate for the President that he stated that merely as an impression, because he contradicts it by what follows it immediately and in the same sentence when he declared that—

> As long as the movement toward manufacturing and away from the farms continues, and the supply of farm laborers is reduced, a continuance of high prices for farm products is inevitable.

Thus in one breath the President says that no conditions here can affect the prices of farm products, and in the next breath he says that the essentially local relation between manufacturing and farm labor renders "a continuance of high prices for farm products inevitable." But irreconcilable as these two statements are they are not the only nor the most palpable contradictions in the paragraph which I have read from the President's Chicago speech. In the sentence which follows that on which I have just commented, the President expresses his opinion as to the effect of reciprocity on the prices of farm products in language which can only mean that he expects and intends for this legislation to reduce their price. Now listen to this declaration, which is a most remarkable one in view of the President's preceding statement that "the cost of farm products is determined by the world's supply and not by local conditions of tariff or otherwise." He says:

> But I do think that reciprocity will enlarge the reservoir or the supply of farm products for our people, and thus prevent any undue enhancement of the prices beyond the present standard.

In this sentence the President expressly declares that he expects to affect the price of farm products in this country, not by some influence operating on the markets of the world, but by creating a reservoir in Canada from which our people may draw and thus prevent prices rising above their present level. Could there be a clearer or a more distinct recognition of the fact that American prices can be reduced, or what is the same thing, can be prevented from rising, by an arrangement between the United States and Canada? In view of the President's candid statement as to the operation of this treaty on the prices of farm products, will any man hereafter deny that such is its purpose?

But the direct conflict which the closing sentence of this paragraph raises with what the President had said in the preceding sentences, is not what will most vitally concern the American farmer. The thought which this last sentence will most deeply impress upon his mind is that the President and the Congress of the United States are deliberately planning to create a reservoir of agricultural products in Canada which will make it impossible for the price of agricultural products in the United States to rise, even though the natural conditions of supply and demand with us should call for that result. There shall be no increase in the price of agricultural products to correspond with the constantly increasing value of land; there shall be no increase in the price of agricultural products to meet the advancing wages of farm labor; there shall be no increase in the price of agricultural products to provide for an ascending scale of farm comforts and for the better education of the farmer's children. The price of everything the farmer must buy may rise under the malignant influence of unlawful combinations or under the unjust rates of a protective tariff, but the farmer must meet these new charges upon his land and his labor by an increased production because he shall not enjoy an increase in the price of his products.

Under the mysterious providence of God—a providence which I do not comprehend, but to which I submit with reverence—the seasons vary with the years, and the farmer's crops vary with the seasons. When the rains and the sunshine are so apportioned that every field brings forth an abundant harvest, the price of agricultural products will fall under the greatly increased production, thus diminishing the farmer's gain; and when unpropitious seasons bring flood or drought, or early frost, and the land yields grudgingly, the short crop will fetch a better price, thus diminishing the farmer's loss. That is the great law of supply and demand, which the farmer can not escape and from which he does not ask to be relieved. He is willing to suffer its losses if he is permitted to enjoy its gains. But, sir, this scheme to create a Canadian reservoir is designed to suspend the operation of that economic law whenever it would neutralize the farmer's losses in consequence of his diminished production; though it will operate without hindrance to neutralize his gain from an increased production. Under our present conditions a small crop will invariably call for an increase of price beyond the present standard, and this increase of price would compensate the farmer in some degree for a diminished production. Indeed, sir, there are wise men who hold that a short crop is not always a misfortune, for not only does a short crop always command a larger price per bushel or per pound, and thus compensate to some extent for a smaller number of bushels or pounds, but its influence always projects itself into the following year, and not infrequently into the third year. That happens because the smaller crop carries over a smaller surplus, and that smaller surplus results in a higher price. It is practically certain that whenever a small surplus exerts an influence over the price of any given article for three years in succession the losses of the farmer are reduced to a minimum. All of this, however, they now propose to change, and under this new and cruel dispensation our farmers may still see their fat years made lean by lower prices, but they can never hope to see their lean years made fat by higher prices.

PRICE OF FARM PRODUCTS WILL FALL.

If there are those in the Senate who do not concur in the opinion of the President that a Canadian reservoir will affect the price of agricultural products, I think I can satisfy them that the effect of this measure will be even greater than the President has said it would, and I can do so by showing that such was the effect of a former law. In 1854 the United States entered into an agreement with Canada, which looked principally to a settlement of the fisheries dispute and the navigation of the St. Lawrence River; but it also included reciprocal free trade in a few articles. That treaty was resisted by some upon the ground that it would injure our farmers; but it was contended then, just as it is contended now, that such a fear was wholly unfounded. Over the protest of those interested in agriculture, though that protest was nothing like so emphatic as the present one, that agreement was concluded, and it became effective in September, 1854. Very soon its results became apparent, and an agitation for its repeal was inaugurated. The Hon. Israel T. Hatch and the Hon. James W. Taylor were instructed by the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate the whole question and to report their conclusions to him. Both Mr. Hatch and Mr. Taylor were advocates of Canadian reciprocity, though they did not agree in their recommendations to the Treasury Department. Mr. Hatch held that Canada had so discriminated against our commerce as to justify us in abrogating the agreement; but Mr. Taylor did not think that those discriminations were serious enough to call for such drastic action. Whether the one or the other was right in that particular is immaterial to us at this time; and I only refer to those reports now, because one of them asserts that the treaty had been a positive detriment to our agricultural classes, and the other does not challenge that statement. Mr. Hatch states, and he repeats that statement in three different places in his report, that the agreement had been a distinct advantage to Canadian agriculture and a corresponding disadvantage to the agriculture of the United States. Let me lay before the Senate exactly what he said:

> The increase in the profits of the Canadian farmer, since the treaty, is well known on both sides of the frontier. The large amount which would have accrued to the United States in the form of duties has gone to his benefit in the increased value of his products and real estate. The production of many articles has been greatly stimulated (much to his advantage), and their importations have been severely felt by our own producers along all that line of frontier through which access is naturally sought in an eastward course to our cities, manufacturing districts, and the great highway of the world.

In another part of the same report Mr. Hatch says:

> We gave to her farmers highly remunerative prices, and brought their lands and productions upon an equality with our own, and thus greatly increased the value of their homesteads. Through their agriculture we aided every branch of their industrial occupation, though we thereby left the most important points of our trade in the hands of those among whom hostile traditions are not yet wholly extinct.

And still in a third place Mr. Hatch declares:

> The grain-growing regions of the Northwestern States have suffered more than other parts of the Union from a depression of prices.

In a very elaborate report made to the House of Representatives by the Hon. Elijah Ward in 1862 he quotes with approval a statement made by a select committee appointed by the legislative assembly of Canada in 1858, in which it was stated that for several years before the treaty of 1854, the price of all articles grown or produced in Canada averaged about 20 per cent below the price of similar articles grown or produced in the United States, and that this difference continued up to the year 1854, when it is a matter of common knowledge that the difference between prices in Canada and prices in the United States disappeared. I will read this extract from Mr. Ward's report:

> Here the special operation of the laws of political economy is worthy of note. Superficially, it is said that the markets of Europe regulate for agricultural productions the markets of this continent, and that the duty remitted on Canadian products was a saving to the pockets of our people, but the products of Canada and our relative position and requirements are such that the United States possess, to some extent, a monopoly of the Canadian market as purchasers of the products of the field. For cattle, sheep, swine, the coarse grains, and certain kinds of lumber we constitute for Canada the only market worthy of naming, and the wheat of Canada, from its peculiar adaptation to our uses, was largely sold to us before the treaty. Of the large amount of wheat received at Toronto, the metropolis of upper Canada, in 1859—the last year of which we possess any authentic statistics on the subject which have been published—only 2 per cent were sent via the St. Lawrence, the rest having been received at Oswego and other American ports, and that the duties—of 20 per cent—were in effect paid by the Canadians prior to the treaty is incontrovertibly established by the report of the select committee on commerce, appointed by the legislative assembly of Canada in 1858, testifying that the effect of the repeal of discriminating duties on grain imported into Great Britain was "to depreciate the value of all articles grown or produced in Canada 20 per cent under the value of like articles grown or produced in the United States, and this difference in value continued up to the year 1854—the year of the treaty—a period of nearly nine years."

Mr. President, the equilibrium of prices in the United States and Canada which followed the treaty of 1854 might have been brought about in either one of three ways. It might have come through a rise in their prices equal to the full difference; or it might have come through a fall in our prices equal to the full difference; or it might have come by their prices rising and our prices falling until they met. My own opinion is that the law of 1854 exerted a much larger influence over prices in Canada than it did over prices in the United States; and I think so because their production was at that time so very small as compared with ours that an influence which would scarcely have made itself felt at all in the price of our great crop would have been very potential over the price of their small crop. But, sir, even if the price equilibrium of that time was brought about entirely by a rise in Canadian prices, no rational man could expect the same result to ensue under this treaty, because the Canadian agricultural surplus now is almost as large as ours in bushels and is a very much larger per cent of the crop. I am therefore absolutely certain that the effect of this agreement will be to elevate the price of farm products in Canada and to depress their price in the United States until a common level is established.

AN INJUSTICE TO AGRICULTURE.

Who will profit by the losses which this bill will entail upon our farmers. On April 28, 1848, the House of Representatives transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury the Canadian reciprocity bill then pending before that body and asked for an expression of his views upon it. Under date of May 1, 1848, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury complied with the request of the House and in his letter he very clearly pointed out the classes who, it was understood at that time, would be the chief beneficiaries of Canadian reciprocity. In that letter he says:

> Very great advantages would accrue to the United States, and especially to New York, New Jersey, northwestern Pennsylvania, and the New England States, and to Jersey City, New York, Brooklyn, and Boston, as well as the States of the Northwest, and all others that ship any of their products from any of the ports on the lakes, whether brought into those ports by wagons, railroads, rivers, or canals. The tolls of our railroads and canals would be increased, and the business of our lake and other ports augmented, and especially in the ports of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City. The trade with the Canadas would be greatly increased. Indeed, nearly all the articles specified in the bill exported from the greater part of Canada to foreign countries would be brought through our ports, and the imports to Canada from all the world would soon nearly all be carried through the same channel; whilst our own manufactures, to complete cargoes and assortments, would often be purchased for consumption in Canada to a far greater extent than under the present system. Indeed, under such a system, as the products of Canada might increase from time to time, nearly the whole surplus exported abroad would be carried upon our rivers, railroads, and canals—upon our cars, boats, and vessels—stored, and sold, and shipped from our cities—greatly improving our commerce and navigation, increasing our tonnage, and invigorating nearly every branch of American industry.

The part of the letter which I have just read was followed by a reply to the inquiry as to whether the adoption of that measure would require us to extend its privileges to other nations with which we had treaties containing the most-favored-nation clause, and the letter closes with this paragraph:

> In conclusion, this department would beg leave most respectfully to recommend the immediate adoption of the measure as proposed by the committee, so as to enable our merchants, traders, and navigators and other industrious citizens, as well as States and companies interested in our railroads and canals, to avail themselves of the many benefits that would be derived from the practical operation of this measure during the present season of navigation, and so as to embrace a large portion of the spring trade.

The same classes who would have been benefited by reciprocity in 1848 are the same classes who will reap its greatest advantage now, and in support of that statement I desire to lay before the Senate two other quotations from the article in Harper's Weekly to which I have already invited its attention. The first is this:

But with the proposed arrangement actually in the hands of the special session and a large proportion of the community fully expectant of its ratification, there is coming to be more and more of a disposition to look at the business side of the question. The "breaking down of artificial barriers" idea is all very well, but rather indefinite and not particularly conducive to accurate estimate as to what reciprocity would mean to the railroads or to the farming communities of the West and the manufacturing communities of the East. And that, after all, is the point of interest to by far the greatest number of people.

Considering first the question of the influence of reciprocity on the railroads, it is plain that the increased tonnage of merchandise passing between the two countries can not but be of great benefit to the transportation companies. Whatever one may think of the advisability of admitting Canadian wheat or other products free of duty, it is a proposition hardly admitting of denial that the lowering or removal of existing tariff charges will tend strongly to stimulate the merchandise movement. Last year our exports to Canada amounted to $242,000,000. Recently it was estimated by the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Commerce of the State Department that if the reciprocity agreement were adopted our exports to Canada in 1915 should total at least $350,000,000 and might reach $400,000,000. This is of course only an estimate, but it is an estimate coming from an excellent source, and serves at least to show the possibilities in the way of increased railroad tonnage arising out of the agreement in question.

Again, and still further specifying the particular beneficiaries of this treaty, he says:

Stimulating to the business of the railroads as the proposed arrangement would be, hardly less beneficial would be its influence on the business of the manufacturing companies. The past ten years have seen a tremendous increase in our productive capacity, an increase by no means offset by growth in our consumptive needs. As a result of the development of this condition, the need of a foreign outlet for our manufactured products is steadily becoming more urgent. Determined efforts during the past six months to work up export business have been attended with a good deal of success, but to establish and hold a market in a foreign country where trade usages vary widely and even the language spoken is different, takes time, and is an operation beset with difficulties. With the productive capacity of our mills and factories increasing as at present, necessity will compel the sale of large amounts of American manufactures in foreign markets; but prices in such cases are by no means always satisfactory, and it will readily appear how much more to the manufacturer's advantage it would be if he had some outlet where selling could be conducted under less pressure.

Thus, Mr. President, we are invited to reduce the price which our farmers receive for their products in order to increase the earnings of our great railroads, and to stimulate the business of our manufacturing establishments. Are we willing to do that? Will our sense of justice permit us to do it? Is there a Senator in this Chamber, or is there a citizen in this Republic, who will dare to stand up before his countrymen and proclaim his willingness to reduce the income of our farms in order to increase the profits of our manufacturers or the dividends of our railroads? I would not impair the revenues of our railroads by denying them a fair compensation for their services, nor would I curtail the profits of our factories by withdrawing from them anything to which they are rightfully entitled. It is not my habit to array class against class, or to incite the poor against the rich. I rejoice in the prosperity of every man and of every enterprise, and I would legislate with impartial justice toward all. But, sir, I will not take from those who have so little and give to those who have so much.

If the law must discriminate between our industries the discrimination should be in favor of the farm rather than against it, because the profits of the farm now, even under the prices against which the people of our cities so vehemently complain, are less than they are in any other useful occupation. Can we point to any farmer who has amassed a fortune by cultivating the soil? Among the 10,000,000 of them in this Republic not one possesses a fortune which a millionaire might envy. After making a due allowance for his time and labor, the average farmer in this country does not realize 3 per cent upon his land investment; and shall we compel him to divide that meager return with men who count their business unsatisfactory unless their profits are three times as great as that.

Who are these men who ask us to reduce their expenses by reducing the income of the farm? Are they less able to pay a tax on what they buy from the farmers than the farmers are to pay a tax on what they buy from the manufacturers? According to the Democratic text book our manufacturers are not only rich, but they have wrung their colossal fortunes from the hard earnings of these very farmers, and we have been charging for many years that they have supplemented the exactions of a high tariff by combinations which our statutes have denounced as a crime. Not satisfied with being rich, they were eager to be richer; protected from foreign competition by a high tariff duty, they have sought to protect themselves from domestic competition by unlawful combinations.

No man has ever made that charge against American farmers; or if any have ever been rash enough to make it, not one has ever been able to sustain it. They have not sought the exorbitant profits of monopoly, nor have they ever restrained our trade in violation of the law. They ask less of the Government and do more for it than any other class. They never evade their taxes and they never shirk their duty. They are the first to answer the call for volunteers and the last to lay down their arms. Their valor has been proved in every war, and their blood consecrates every battle field from Concord to San Juan Hill.

Not only, sir, are they loyal and unselfish patriots, but they are the most useful of all our people. Their patronage sustains our towns, and they produce the material essential to so many of our enterprises. From their fields come those commodities which constitute our chief commerce with foreign nations and bring every year uncounted gold to liquidate the balance of trade, which, due to them, is nearly always in our favor. We need factories and railroads, and our civilization would progress by slow and painful stages without them; but, sir, this Government was founded before the dream of a railroad had ever glorified the brain of a man, and we won the War of Independence when our manufacturing industries were as nothing. If we should close the door of every factory and put out the fire in every engine, our people could be happy and contented. But it is not so with these farms. If they should be abandoned for a season, commercial and industrial disaster would paralyze the energies of the Nation and suffering would come to men of every station and pursuit. If the farmers should forsake their fields for a single year, our factories would close, our merchants would fail, the grass would grow in the streets of our cities, and famine would sacrifice our fairest and our bravest to the fiend of hunger. Oh, no, Mr. President, while I do not plead for a special privilege to the farmer, he is the last man upon whom I will impose an unjust burden.

If we turn from a comparison between the prosperity of those who own and operate the mills and those who own and cultivate the farms to a comparison between the factory employee and the farm laborer, we will find nothing to convince us that the wages of farm laborers should be reduced in order to reduce the cost of living to factory employees. In the factory they work 8 hours a day, rest through every Sunday and on nearly every holiday, while on the farm they work 12 hours each day, and neither the Sabbath day nor the holiday is free from toil. The skilled artisan of the city will earn more in a single week than the farm laborer can earn in a full month, and his other advantages are greater than the difference in his wages. A splendid schoolhouse stands almost in sight of the city laborer's door, and accomplished teachers, who draw good salaries, are there to train his children, while the farm laborer's children must trudge through rain and snow a distance of several miles to reach a modest schoolhouse, where an underpaid teacher imparts inferior instruction. Is it right, is it humane, to tell these farm laborers that they must give something of the pittance which they now receive, so that their more prosperous brothers in the city may live better or live more cheaply than they do now? It is an old philosophy, Mr. President—and it may have grown obsolete, but I still cling to it as I do to the faith of my fathers—that the safety of this Republic is better secured by lifting those who are low from their humble station than by leaving them to sink still lower while we help those who are already well placed. And adhering to that belief, I would improve the condition of the farm laborer until it approaches the condition of his brother in the city, rather than make the disparity between their conditions greater than it is to-day; because, sir, if we pursue the latter course, we must expect that the discontented laborers of the country will continue to drift in larger numbers to our overcrowded industrial centers.

We have heard much in recent years about the danger of withdrawing our people from the country and concentrating them in our cities. Can we reverse or even arrest that tendency by subtracting from the profits of the farm and adding to the comforts of the city? No, sir, if you expect intelligent and worthy men to answer your call of "back to the farm" you must make farm life more attractive; you must help the farmers to improve their homes and beautify their surroundings. I am not able to understand how any man could prefer the city, with its bitter strifes, its narrow jealousies, its tumults, and its passions, over the farm, where the springs and streams, the fields and pastures, the woodlands and meadows speak to us a ravishing language and bring us close to the great, throbbing heart of nature. There I would be glad to spend my days, and "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife," pursue those studies which elevate the mind and purify the ambition.

I could live forever in peace among its herds and flocks and horses. I love its cattle, which supply the human race with meat and drink; I love its sheep, whose flesh gives strength and whose fleece gives comfort to the family of men; and above its cattle and sheep I love its horses, for they are man's best friend and servant. As he walks with steady tread between the furrows helping his master to produce the cotton and the corn which clothes and feeds the world; as through the days and years he draws his burden in our towns and cities, patiently performing the drudgery of commerce; on the field of battle, where with flashing eyes and foaming sides he bears his martial rider to victory or to death; and on the race course, where with distended nostril and quivering nerve he struggles with his kind for the supremacy in stamina and speed; at all times and in all places the horse is the noblest of God's dumb creatures.

But, sir, while these sentiments would carry me to the farm, even if I had to support it without expecting it to support me, they will not appeal to all of our countrymen, and nothing can arrest or reverse the tendency from the country and toward the city except to make country life profitable as well as pleasant. If you can but do that, sir, we will restore to our farms and plantations the glory of a former day, and there the master spirits of our age will study with delight and diligence the basic principles of free government. Then may we hope to see the petty wrangles which now degrade our politics give way to a discussion of the great principles which promote a nation's prosperity and preserve a people's freedom.

SOME GROSS DISCRIMINATIONS.

Except that I know how vain and how useless it would be, I would take up this treaty article by article and expose the anomalies, the absurdities, and the inequalities which mar almost every paragraph of it; but I realize that to do this would be a waste of my time and strength. Inasmuch, however, as I intend this speech for my constituents who will read it, rather than for my associates who do me the honor to hear it, I will venture to call attention to some of its most flagrant vices, though in doing that I must repeat some of the things which I have already said against it in the course of this debate.

This bill repeals the duty on hay, which yielded last year a revenue of more than $386,000 to the Public Treasury; and yet it still leaves a duty on everything which the farmer must buy and use in making and marketing his hay. Senators might doubt that statement if they did not know that I would not misrepresent the provisions of a bill, and I could hardly consider it a reflection upon my standing in the Senate if in amazement at it they doubted the correctness of what I have just said. Free hay and taxed implements with which to make and market it! I would call that a grotesque absurdity if it were not an infamous injustice. This Government collected on hay imported from Canada last year more than 20 times as much as on farming implements. All of the agricultural implements imported from Canada last year—not haymaking implements alone, but farm implements of every kind—paid into the Public Treasury less than $22,000, while hay itself paid $386,000, and will Senators tell me that when we repeal the revenue-producing duty on hay and leave this almost barren duty on farming implements we are obeying the Democratic commandments? Is it right and fair, Mr. President, to send the American farmer into his meadow to cut his free hay with a taxed mower, to rake it with a taxed rake, to stack it with a taxed stacker, and to bale it with a taxed baler? But the outrage does not end there, for he must then haul it to town on a taxed wagon, drawn by horses which wear taxed harness made out of free hides. Only the hay and the horses are untaxed, and they are both products of the farm. Can you hope to appease, or even to moderate, the indignation of an American farmer over an injustice like that by telling him that the cities are entreating us to reduce the cost of living?

The case of hay is not much, if any, worse than the case of wheat. This bill totally repeals the duty on wheat and still leaves a duty on flour. It compels the farmer to sell his wheat to the miller untaxed, and yet he must buy it back in the shape of taxed flour. What kind of justice is it, sir, that applies one rule to the wheat which the farmer sells and another rule to the flour which the farmer buys? What difference is there between wheat and flour which should make one free and leave the other subject to a tax? Wheat is but flour in its nonconsumable form, and flour is but wheat in its consumable form. If any difference should be made between them, every rule of justice and of sound policy would require that the flour which men buy to give them strength and preserve their health should be free from tax, while the prosperous miller might be fairly left to pay a tax upon the wheat which he buys purely and only for the sake of the profit which he can make by grinding it into flour. But, Mr. President, this gross and this obvious injustice of repealing the tax on wheat and leaving it on flour is not the most indefensible phase of this particular provision, or at least it is not the most indefensible phase of it to a Democrat, because while pretending to strip the farmer for the benefit of his brother in the city, it does not transfer to the consumer all it takes from the farmer, for it lodges the larger part of it in the pockets of the miller. Let me make that plain, and I can make it so plain that the dullest man in Christendom can understand it.

The present duty on wheat is 25 cents per bushel, and it requires 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. Therefore the miller must now pay to the Government of the United States $1.12½ for the privilege of importing enough wheat from Canada to make a barrel of flour. The duty on flour is 25 per cent ad valorem, and as the price of flour imported from Canada averages about $5 per barrel, the total duty expressed in dollars and cents would be $1.25. Thus, under the present law the miller pays the Government $1.12½ on the imported wheat sufficient to make a barrel of flour, and enjoys a protection of $1.25 on that barrel of flour when made, leaving him a net protection of 12½ cents per barrel. This bill totally repeals the duty on the wheat which the miller buys, but it only reduces the duty on the flour which the miller sells; and the final result of this legislation will be that where the miller now pays $1.12½ and collects $1.25, under this Canadian treaty he will pay out nothing at all and still collect 50 cents on every barrel of his flour. In other words, and in plain words, this bill gives the miller a net protection of 300 per cent above the present law. Can it be possible, Mr. President, that any Democrat really believes that a bill which enormously increases the protection over the Payne-Aldrich Act is "a step in the right direction"?

Unjust and indefensible as are the discriminations between hay and hay-making implements, or between wheat and flour, they are not worse than the discriminations between cattle and meat. Under the law as it now stands cattle worth more than $14 per head are subject to a duty of 27½ per cent, and, therefore, on a steer worth $40 imported from Canada the duty would be $11. The duty on the meat which that steer would dress is 1½ cents per pound; and assuming that such a steer will dress 800 pounds—and he would not dress more than that—the protection on his carcass would aggregate $12, which would leave the packer a net protection of $1 after paying the import duty of $11. This bill totally repeals the duty on the imported steer, but it only reduces the duty on the dressed meat from 1½ to 1¼ cents per pound. Now, let us compare the results to the packer under the law as it stands and under the law as it will stand when this Canadian agreement becomes effective. The packer now pays out $11 and collects back $12, leaving him a net protection of $1. Under this agreement he will pay out nothing and collect $10, thus leaving him a net protection of the entire $10. Mr. President, every Democrat in this country capable of making a speech has denounced the Payne-Aldrich bill with savage fury, and yet, sir, we are now asked to give the beef packers of this country a clear protection of $10, where the Payne-Aldrich bill gave them a clear protection of only $1. Admitting that the people will pay $2 less for the meat of that steer—and I do not admit that, because a reducion of ¼ of a cent per pound is not susceptible of a division which can be transmitted to the consumer; but conceding that the people will get the benefit of the entire reduction in the duty on meat—it will amount to but $2 to them, while the reduction of the duty on the cattle out of which the packers dress the meat will amount to $11. The Government gives up $11, of which the people get $2 and the beef packers get $9. Or, to state it in a different but in a perfectly legitimate way, the protection afforded to the packer by this bill is exactly 10 times as great as the protection afforded by the Payne-Aldrich bill.

These objections to the bill are acknowledged and, I hope, regretted by every Democrat in the Senate; but they urge me to support it in spite of them, because it places lumber, wood pulp, and print paper on the free list. Sir, those items, so far from inclining me to support the bill, are next to its free farm products the most objectionable provisions in it. Let us dispassionately consider them, and decide what claims they have upon our conscience and our judgment.

First, let us take lumber, and let us not forget that this bill repeals the duty on rough lumber only. It takes nothing from the planing mill or other lumber manufacturer, because it has reduced the duty on dressed lumber to correspond exactly with the repeal of the duty on rough lumber, thus leaving the planing mill and other lumber manufacturers in precisely the same condition as it found them. I assert that the duty now on lumber is the most thoroughly Democratic item in the whole tariff law; and I say that because among the 4,000 articles now subject to a tariff duty not one of them with a rate so low as lumber yields as much revenue as it does to the Public Treasury. The present duty on rough lumber is a fraction less than 7 per cent and we collected about $1,200,000 under it last year. How is it possible for any Democrat to insist upon the repeal of a 7 per cent duty which raises more than $1,000,000 of revenue? If you tell me that you are repealing that low duty because lumber is a necessity of life, I will answer you by saying that the wool bill, which a Democratic House of Representatives has sent to us, leaves a duty on woolen clothes, which are as much a necessity of life as lumber, of more than 42 per cent, and the revenue necessities of the Government would not permit them to reduce the rate below that point. Can we approve a duty of 42 per cent on clothing because the public expenditures require it, and then justify ourselves in repealing a 7 per cent duty on lumber? No, sir; the American people, or at least the intelligent ones, will not accept such an explanation.

They tell me that the people ought to have free homes, but the only part of the home which this bill makes free is that which comes from the forest, and it leaves a tax on every part of the home which comes from the factory. Before we repeal the 7 per cent tax on lumber which supplies an annual revenue of more than $1,000,000 why not repeal the tax on the paints which beautify the house and preserve the lumber. The duty on paints is 300 per cent higher than the duty on lumber and raises less than half the revenue. Before we repeal the 7 per cent duty on lumber why not repeal the 89 per cent duty on the common window glass which lets God's light into the cottage home? The tariff on common window glass is 12 times as high as the tariff on lumber and yields less than $11,000 of revenue to the Public Treasury, while lumber yields 100 times that much. Every tool which mechanics use in building a house is subject to a duty which averages 400 per cent more than the duty on lumber, and the revenue collected from all of those tools combined is less than 25 per cent of what is collected on rough lumber alone.

Lumber is not the only material of which houses are built. Cement and brick are extensively used in building, and why should the tax on lumber be repealed while the duties on cement and brick, which compete with it, remain? The duty on cement is 25 per cent and yielded less revenue than lumber. The tariff on bricks is 25 per cent, and the Government collected less than $7,000 from them last year. The duty on bricks is nearly four times as great as the duty on lumber, and yet the revenue collected from lumber was nearly 200 times as great as the revenue collected from bricks. But all of this, Mr. President, is to be ignored, and notwithstanding the duty on both cement and bricks is much higher than the duty on lumber, and notwithstanding the revenue from lumber is much greater than the revenue derived from both cement and bricks, it is still insisted that the lumber shall be made free, while a duty is to be left on those competing articles. A Senator near me suggests that poor people do not buy cement and brick with which to build their houses; and I will answer that first by saying that neither do the poor buy lumber, because they are not fortunate enough to own their own houses. It may be said, however, that at last the cost of the houses falls on them, because they occupy them as tenants and pay the rent; and responding to that view of the question, I would say to the Senator who suggests that the poor do not buy brick and cement with which to build houses, that his suggestion is not correct so far as it relates to the cities of this country, because at least 90 per cent of the wage earners of our cities live in houses built of brick and cement. If we turn from the cities, where the poor must have brick and cement houses, to the towns and the country, I can easily show the Senate how utterly absurd it is to suppose that the 7 per cent duty on lumber oppresses any poor man.

The average frame house occupied by tenant farmers in the country and the wage earners of our smaller towns will require less than 10,000 feet of lumber, and I would be nearer the exact figures if I said 5,000 feet. But let us estimate it at 10,000 feet, and let us suppose that the entire tariff of $1.25 per thousand is added to the price of the lumber in every community of the United States. How will the account then stand? Ten thousand feet of lumber increased in price by reason of the tariff at the rate of $1.25 per thousand would mean an additional cost of $12.50 on the house. That is much less than the increased price which the average family would pay for its woolen clothes with a duty of 42 per cent on them. But, Mr. President, we must not forget that these purchases of clothes are annual—indeed, they are semiannual, because there must be some change provided with the seasons—while the house is built only once in 25 years, which means that the tariff on lumber taxes the home builder 50 cents per year, and that, sir, is less than the tariff tax on a single wool hat at the rate of 42 per cent.

The proposal to place wood pulp on the free list is as unjust and as undemocratic as the proposal to place lumber on the free list. The present duty on wood pulp is less than 11 per cent, and we collected more than $1,000,000 last year from its importation. The entire importation did not come from Canada; but with wood pulp free from that country our entire imports will hereafter come from there, and consequently we will collect no revenue from wood pulp imported from other countries. Next to lumber, wood pulp perhaps yields a larger amount of revenue than any other article with a duty so low; and I will not vote to repeal a 10 per cent duty which yields a large annual revenue. They can not tell us that wood pulp is a necessary of life. They can not even say that it is an article of universal use, because it is consumed only by paper manufacturers. Who are they, sir, and how many of them are there that we should thus violate a Democratic principle by repealing a small duty, which produces a large revenue, for their benefit?

In their arguments for free print paper the representatives of the publishers who appeared before the Finance Committee denounced these paper manufacturers in terms of the greatest severity, and charged them with committing crimes in order to secure high prices for the product of their mills; and yet, strange to say, these publishers are demanding free raw material for the print-paper corporations, which they have denounced as guilty of organizing and conducting an unlawful combination. I can understand how a Democrat might be willing to place the articles which a trust sells on the free list, but I can not understand how any sane Democrat can be willing to put the material which a trust buys on the free list. The paper manufacturers of the United States number less than 900, and if what the purchasers of their product say can be relied on they are more than prosperous. Why, then, shall we remit a million dollars of revenue to a very small class of rich and greedy men? Are they not able to pay their share of taxes? Nobody, sir, doubts that they are more than able to do so, and this proposition to give them their raw material free of tax is simply a part of the newspapers' plan to sugar-coat another provision of the bill.

I come now, Mr. President, to discuss the question of free print paper, and in that provision lies the secret of the irresistible power which is forcing this agreement through the American Congress without amendment. Except for the newspaper campaign in its behalf, this agreement would never have passed either House of Congress. Publications of high repute have become so intense on the question that they act as if they were bereft of reason. They bestow high praise on the feeble-minded who support it and assail with shameful misrepresentation nearly every man who dares to oppose it. I do not underestimate the value of an intelligent and incorruptible press in a free republic; and even though some papers abuse their freedom and defame, without conscience and without cause, the most upright man whom they do not happen to like, I am one of those who think it better to bear that evil than to destroy the liberty of expression which means so much in a country like ours. I am therefore inclined to be entirely just—indeed, I am willing to be generous—to the newspapers of this land; but, sir, with all their power they can not drive me to do for them what I will not do for men who are more worthy of our generosity than they are.

Upon what plea can the newspapers ask the repeal of the 10 per cent duty which they now pay upon their print paper? That, sir, is no more than their printers pay upon their shoes, and it is less than a fourth of what their printers must pay upon their clothing. Who will affront the intelligence of the American people by declaring that the great newspapers of this land are less able to pay a tax of 10 per cent on their print paper than the poorest laborer is to pay an average tax of twice that much on the commonest necessities of life? Remember, sir, that on everything the poor man wears, from the hat which covers his head to the shoes which protect his feet; from his undershirt to his overcoat, this Government levies a tax which will average more than three times as much as these rich publishers are required to pay on their print paper. Is it right for us to repeal this moderate tax upon the few who are rich and prosperous and leave it upon the millions whose constant labor scarcely provides them with the necessaries of life? Are these newspapers not able to pay their tax? The chairman of their print-paper committee testified before the Finance Committee of the Senate that the repeal of this duty would be worth $6,000,000 to the publishers of our great daily papers, and he also said that one man who publishes papers in several different cities used one-tenth of all the print paper consumed by his association, which would mean a saving to the Hearst papers alone of $600,000 annually. Do they need this benefaction? I doubt if any single class of our people realize a profit on their business equal to these great newspapers and magazines. Their earnings run all the way from the tens of thousands into the millions every year, and if the repeal of this duty fulfills their expectations it will add from $5,000 to smallest to more than $500,000 to the largest. The gentleman who was most insistent upon this measure admitted before your committee that his paper paid a corporation tax last year on a net earning of $187,000. Shall a man of such abounding presperity be relieved from the moderate tax of 10 per cent on his print paper while his office boy is compelled to pay a tax of treble that much on everything which he buys for the comfort of a widowed mother? I do not believe in such special exemptions for the rich and powerful, and I will not vote to grant them.

Mr. President, my Democratic friends, conscious of the discriminations and injustices of this measure, do not attempt to defend it, but justify themselves in voting for it upon the ground that it is "a step in the right direction." That, sir, is the weakest excuse ever offered by an intelligent man for supporting a bad measure. It is so indefinite that the average mind can not comprehend it, and it is so vague that the trained mind can not analyze it. Before I can be satisfied that this is a step in the right direction I want to know where it will lead us, for if it does not lead to the end we seek, it can not be in the right direction. If it be our ultimate purpose to repeal the duties on all farm products while only reducing the duties on factory products, then this is a step in the right direction. But, sir, that is a road which I utterly refuse to travel.

RECIPROCITY NOT A DEMOCRATIC POLICY.

They tell me that reciprocity is an ancient and traditional policy of the Democratic Party. I deny that. It is true that the agreement with Canada in 1854 was negotiated by a Democratic President and approved by a Democratic Congress. That agreement, however, was radically different from this. When it placed wheat on the free list, it placed flour there also; and when it placed cattle on the free list it placed meat there also. But even that treaty was never made a party question. It was not advocated in our national platform of 1852, and it was not indorsed in our national platform of 1856. In fact, sir, the Democratic national platform of 1892 was the first one which ever contained a declaration in favor of reciprocity, and if that had been drawn with special reference to this bill, it could not have more specifically condemned it. Let me read that plank of our platform to the Democrats of the Senate and ask them if this bill does not fall within its denunciation:

Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith, but we denounce the sham reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges by pretending to establish closer trade relations for a country whose articles of export are almost exclusively agricultural, while erecting a customhouse barrier of prohibitive tariff taxes against the richest countries of the world that stand ready to take our entire surplus of products and to exchange therefor commodities which are necessaries and comforts of life among our own people.

Our national platform of 1896 was silent on the question of reciprocity, as was our platform of 1900. A declaration on the subject, however, reappeared in our platform of 1904, but it expressly confined its approval to reciprocity agreements which will benefit agriculture as well as manufactures, mining, and commerce. In the meantime, however, the question had been presented to the Democrats in both Houses of Congress, and they voted with practical unanimity against these trade agreements. Every Democrat in the House and in the Senate when we were a minority in both voted against the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley bill in 1890, and when our minority had grown into a majority every Democrat in both Houses voted to repeal those provisions in 1894. Not only that, but the Democratic campaign book of 1902 denounced reciprocity and outlawed it from all Democratic approval. Let me read a few of the things—for they are only a part of them—which that campaign book said about reciprocity, and then let those who find fault with my position include in their criticism the congressional committee of 1902, which counted among its members several who are now ardent supporters of this bill. Here is what it says:

Reciprocity looks like free trade, but tastes like protection. It is really a new sugar coating prepared by the Republican tariff doctors for many patients who are refusing to take their protection pills straight.

In practice reciprocity is worse than protection.

Our farmers are not sending delegates to Washington to threaten Congress if it does not pass reciprocity legislation. There is nothing in it for farmers. To them it is a sham and a fraud.

Reciprocity is a device for keeping quiet certain manufacturers who are being injured as much as benefited by the present system, and who threaten to turn traitor and help tear down the tariff which still shelters the great manufacturing trusts.

Reciprocity cares nothing for the consumer and hunts foreign markets with a club. Its stock in trade is high tariff, favoritism, discrimination, and retaliation. It threatens to slam our doors in the face of foreign countries which will not open their doors to our products.

Reciprocity is based upon the same false theories as is protection, and, like protection, is a sham and a humbug, and to most people has been and will ever continue to be a delusion and a snare.

Reciprocity can not help the farmer, but may benefit some manufacturer.

Reciprocity with one country means a tariff war with other countries. It makes a few friends and many enemies.

Reciprocity is put forward to save "protection" and to stave off the demand for genuine tariff revision.

It is the handmaid of protection and is inconsistent with the theories of free trade. As James G. Blaine said, "The enactment of reciprocity is the safeguard of protection."

Reciprocity may not be so bad as it was described in this Democratic campaign book, and I would not be willing to say that under no circumstances could a Democrat consistently support a trade agreement of any kind. I can easily conceive of circumstances under which such a measure might be a desirable way of adjusting international differences. The treaty of 1854, which it is sought to make a precedent for this measure, was principally designed to settle our fisheries dispute with Canada, together with questions relating to the navigation of the St. Lawrence River, and the few articles for which it provided reciprocal free trade were really more the incident than the object of that treaty. I can also conceive circumstances under which a trade agreement might be a proper method of regulating our intercourse with some particular country and relieving the commerce between us from vexatious restrictions or discriminations. I might support such an agreement if I thought that it would settle an international complication without sacrificing the interest of our whole country or doing an injustice to any part of our people. I am free to say, however, that nothing less than a most extraordinary circumstance could induce me to support any treaty extending special favors to any country.

I was a Member of this Senate when the reciprocity treaty with Cuba was ratified, and I was also a Member of it when we passed the bill making that treaty effective by the approval of Congress. I resisted both with all my power, and if I could derive a satisfaction from a mistake made by my country I would find it in the subsequent events, which fully and completely vindicated my opposition to that measure. I resisted it, first, upon the ground that whenever we discounted our tariff rates on sugar from Cuba other countries which were competing against Cuban sugar in our markets would resent, and would have a right to resent, the discrimination. My warning and my protest were as unavailing then as they will be unavailing now, but in less than 90 days after we remitted a part of our tariff taxes to Cuba Germany increased her restrictions against some of our important agricultural exports, and our cottonseed products especially suffered from her retaliation. I also resisted that treaty upon the ground that the Sugar and Tobacco Trusts, being the principal and almost the only importers of sugar and tobacco from Cuba, would appropriate the larger part of the duties which were remitted, and I predicted that in the end the people of Cuba would obtain a small benefit, the Sugar Trust and the Tobacco Trust would obtain a large benefit, and the American people would obtain no benefit at all from it. That my prediction has been fulfilled to the letter no man familiar with the course of sugar and tobacco prices will now deny.

But, Mr. President, while I have not yet seen a trade agreement which I would support, I will not follow the bad example which my Democratic friends have set me when they say that a Democrat ought to support every agreement of that kind by saying that no Democrat can support any agreement of that kind. I am willing to concede that some of them might be wise and proper, and I know that some of them may be unwise and improper. I am willing to judge each one on its own terms and conditions; but I will never support one not drawn in accordance with the great principles of justice and equality; and this agreement does not answer that description. If this Government can dispense with any part of the revenue which it now collects, let us remit the taxes of the poor. I would not exempt the poor from taxation out of any desire to flatter their poverty, nor would I tax the rich to discourage thrift and punish prosperity. But I would exempt the poor, because, as they have no property to protect, the Government gives them protection only on their lives and liberty; and for that they return a full equivalent in the personal services which they stand always ready to render the Government in peace as well as in war. I would tax the rich because all the taxes which they pay do not more than reimburse the Government for the security which it affords to their property and property rights.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have once before spoken on this bill, but not during this session. I gave notice yesterday that I would occupy some of the time of the Senate in speaking on it to-day.

I want to state to my Democratic colleagues on this side that I am somewhat at a loss to analyze the situation. I can not understand how we can stand upon this floor and argue as Democratic doctrine as logical from our viewpoint that because the duty is removed from the products of the farmer he will necessarily lose in the returns from his farm, because it must be true, therefore, that the plea is not made for revenue for the Government, because, if the Government is to receive a revenue, there must come into this country those articles that produce that revenue; but if such articles come in to produce revenue, the Government, and not the farmer, becomes the beneficiary. Therefore to plead for a duty to remain upon the products of the farm is to plead for protection, and I take it that no Democrat on this floor is pleading for protection.

As I take it, the whole question at issue is the same old fight that has been fought since the first tariff bill of 1789. The question involved in Canadian reciprocity is identically the same, namely, whether or not we shall levy a duty for the promotion of favored and coddled industries or whether we shall levy that duty for the support of the Government, regardless of who is affected.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I am not standing here representing in part my State as a Senator from South Carolina, pleading that because some other State has joined in the unholy division of this unholy tax I am discriminated against or my State is discriminated against; but I stand here to say that, as a Democrat, I am fighting a principle which by virtue of its operation has robbed the mass of the American people for the benefit of the few. I am not here pretending to argue that an injustice will be done the farmers of America because that which they produce will be brought into free competition with that which is produced in Canada. Were I to argue that, Mr. President, the logic would be irresistible that I was arguing for protection, because if the duty benefits the farmer, it is protective; and if the duty does not benefit him, it does not protect him; and why should he want it?

I shall not stand upon this floor as a Democrat and argue that because the iniquity has been perpetrated and the American people have suffered by reason of high duties on manufactures, I have the right to stand here and demand my share. The right attitude, as I take it, for every Democrat is to attest his love for his principle and make his sacrifice for it, even though he be a farmer, and say to the country, "If you do not need a revenue on my product for the support of the Government, make it free and give me the same privilege of importing from other countries in like manner"; but is he a Democrat if he stands here and says that because there is a duty on what he has to buy, therefore you must put a duty upon what he has to sell, in order to equalize the burden?

Suppose we carry that, Mr. President, to its final and last and logical analysis. Here is the man who owns the field, who owns the farm, who owns the forest, who owns the mine that produce the raw material; here is the accumulated wealth that owns the factory, that owns the means of manufacturing, producing the finished product. We meet here and legislate for the protection of the man who produces the raw material; we meet here and legislate for the man who produces the finished product. Then what, in the name of reason and justice, becomes of that vast host who do not own the farm or the forest or the mine on the one hand, nor the factory on the other hand, but who have to depend upon their daily wage in working the farm, tending the loom, running the factory, and making possible the products of the one and the products of the other? What legislation are you going to pass to protect them?

The merest tyro in mathematics must know that, if you put a duty upon the raw material and collect it, and then put a duty upon the finished article made out of that raw material, which has been enhanced in price, and collect that duty, the man who buys it must necessarily pay a double tax. The result upon the American laborer, the result upon the vast army of the American poor, if the arguments that I have heard upon this floor are carried to their last analysis, must inevitably be that the man who does not own property in the form that produces the raw material or property in the form that produces the finished product must forever be at the sweet will of the man who employs him to render the service, while the man who employs him has the backing of the United States Government to see that his profits shall be kept intact.

There is one further point, Mr. President, before I leave this question of the farmer, to which I want to call attention. No Senator upon this floor would attempt to argue that were you to give the wheat grower of the West the same ad valorem duty on his wheat that you give to the manufacturer of the flour, by the very nature of the case the farmer could exact from the purchaser of his wheat the full measure of the duty, as could the manufacturer. Why? In the first place, as a class of people they represent every race and nationality and all degress of education and wealth; they are vast in number; they are poor; and eternally behind them is the force of necessity. What they make within the twelvemonth they must sell within the same time, while the manufacturers, few in number, rich and powerful in wealth, can easily organize and out of their surplus wealth force the price of the raw material, in spite of any duty that you may put upon it, to such a figure as they may offer. Is not that true of all agricultural products, barring a few that happen to be fortunately located?

Take the question of wheat in the West. I have just read from the Canadian Abstract that the difference between Canadian and American wheat last season was but 2 cents a bushel; but, Mr. President, I do not propose to quote figures or to argue results. Any man can change figures; he may be mistaken in them, but, thank God, no man can be mistaken in principles. We are not here arguing who it will benefit financially, but we are here as National Representatives of the people of America attempting to argue what is honest and right. We are not here for the purpose of saying whether it will impoverish the New England States or enrich the South or impoverish the South or enrich the New England States. We are not here to argue whether it will benefit the farmer and enrich the manufacturer. These are but incidents of a pernicious and vicious law. We are here for the purpose of arguing what is right, what is just under the law, not a question of my share of a bad thing, but to join forces to forever remove the bad thing.

I want to state here that the Democratic Party is not standing here as a party attempting to increase the burden of the farmer by forcing him into competition with Canada. That is not our attitude. This is but an incident in the warfare—a step in the right direction. We are not attempting to discriminate against him. We are attempting to remove the duties, to establish free intercourse with Canada, if it does not interfere with the revenue of the Government, and then in our free-list bill we will attempt to give the farmer relief by removing the iniquity under which he suffers.

I wish to say again in this connection that if you were to pile up the duties on all farm products beyond the value of the products themselves, you would not relieve the farmer, if you were to leave like duties on what he has to buy. He has not the capital to protect himself; and the consequence would be that while it would be a fine thing on paper, on the hustings, and possibly a good thing to get votes, in the last analysis the man who can organize and take advantage of the position would be the man who would take advantage of the weak and the poor, and that is what would be done.

The farmer must necessarily represent the weakest element of our body politic and of our whole domestic social fabric, as he must necessarily represent the poorest by virtue of the fact that it takes less capital and, in many instances, it takes less training to make a living on the farm than in other business. The only relief under our Government that can be given the farmer is the relief of removing the oppression and not make him a party to it. That is the distinction.

I want to put myself as a Democrat in the proper light. Being a farmer myself, I would be the last man to attempt to oppress the farmer; but, being a farmer, I am not asking, nor will I ask as a Democrat, and, I hope, as a right-thinking man, that so long as good stealing is going on, give me my share. I do not want it, and in attestation of the faith I have in the doctrine I profess I am perfectly willing, and shall so vote on all occasions, that farm products shall be reduced to the very lowest revenue basis, if a revenue must be collected, and wherever possible put them upon the free list. Having attested my faith, then I will join battle to see that all manufactured articles shall be brought to the same just and equitable position.

In the discussion that has taken place on the question of reciprocity the same principles have been discussed that were involved in the tariff of 1789, and have been the basis of the division between the two great contending forces until the present time. I take it that in a republican form of government such as ours the question for each and every national representative to settle for himself is, What will contribute the most to the general welfare? I shall not discuss this question from the standpoint of a Democrat simply, but from the standpoint of an American citizen attempting to discharge his duty to the Nation and to every citizen of that Nation which his State has elected him to represent.

I am not here for the purpose of representing South Carolina alone, only in so far as South Carolina is an integral part of the American Union, and only in so far as her interests can contribute to the interests of every other State, and every other State contributing to her interest. I am not here to see that the products of my State or my section of the country shall by law become the beneficiaries of that law at the expense of the welfare and progress of the balance of the United States or any portion thereof. Had it been the purpose of the framers of our Constitution to have guaranteed to certain interests, certain sections, particular favors not guaranteed to others, the Constitution had never been ratified or agreed to.

The geographical position of our country, more fortunate than that of any other country upon the globe, and the intelligence of our people under a republican form of Government should impel us to fight shy of and to resist any protective legislation. Some parts of our country are peculiarly adapted to the production of raw materials either in the form of farm products or the products of the mines; other parts are adapted to manufactures, and upon that very fact has turned the pernicious legislation that has caused all this agitation.

But it was unquestionably the aim and object of the framers of our Constitution to grant to every individual the freest possible exercise of every function possessed consonant with good citizenship. It is nowhere declared in the Constitution that the Government was to enter in and become a partner in the commercial business of the country. Its function in this regard was to pass such laws as should guarantee to each and every individual the fullest opportunity to enrich himself by all honest means. But we have drifted away from that. And by the incorporation into our Federal laws of this pernicious doctrine of protection we have necessarily legislated for and directly in the interest of one class of our citizens at the expense of another, financially and commercially.

The greatest proof that the doctrine of protection is absolutely incorrect and contrary to the principles of civic righteousness and justice is that 122 years of its practical operation has not demonstrated its righteousness or satisfied the people as to its equity. On the contrary, in 1911, the opposition to it is more pronounced and bitter than at any preceding stage of its operation. The manifestations of its injustices, as it has grown in years and in power, have convinced the American people more and more of its iniquitous character.

The President of 1911 was elected upon a platform declaring for tariff revision, or a modification of the effects upon the American people of this pernicious doctrine. The Payne-Aldrich bill was the result of the effort of the Republican Party to fulfill this pledge. There were protests from the Democrats, of course, and from a certain element of the Republican Party, against the provisions of this bill. The Democrats and these Republicans protested that it in no wise lessened the burdens or modified the evils of protection. The President of the United States saw fit to sign the instrument. I believed then, and I believe now, that had he vetoed this bill he would have done his country the greatest service ever done by a President in an economic sense, and would have made himself far greater in the estimation of the American people than that estimation now measures. But he signed it. It became law. The election of the fall of 1910 measured the protest of the American people against it. It was then that the President of the United States recommended to Congress this Canadian reciprocity.

The advocates of protection have declared that protection was necessary to enable the American manufacturer to so develop his business that in the course of a reasonable time he would be enabled to furnish the greatest quantity of the best quality at the cheapest price; that it was not a bar to a fair competition; that the prices paid by the American people for the American product were not prohibitory; that under protection the revenues were greater the higher the protection, and that the wealth and welfare of the people were increased. It is interesting in this connection to quote two statements of the President. He is alleged to have said in a speech after signing this bill that it was the best ever, thereby practically agreeing to its provisions. In his message to Congress accompanying his proposed Canadian reciprocity he uses the following language in reference to the tariff as applied to Canada:

> We have on the north of us a country contiguous to ours for 3,000 miles, with the natural resources of the same character as ours, which have not been drawn upon as ours have been, and in the development of which, as to wages and character of the wage earner, and the transportation to market, differ but little from those prevailing with us. * * * Ought we not, then, to arrange a commercial agreement with Canada, if we can, by which we shall have direct access to her great supply of natural products without an obstructing or prohibitory tariff?

Mark you, he uses the words "prohibitory and obstructive." But he also uses the words "natural products," thereby indicating that he is in favor of the freest possible importation of the raw material, seemingly believing that the cheapening of the raw material will necessarily cheapen the manufactured product. He says further, in another paragraph:

> Reciprocity with Canada must necessarily be chiefly confined in its effect on the cost of living to food and forest products. The question of the cost of clothes as affected by duty on textiles and their raw materials, so much mooted, is not within the scope of the agreement with Canada, because she raises comparatively few wool sheep, and her textile manufactures are unimportant.

Earlier in his message he uses this language:

> We have reached the stage in our own development that calls for a statesmanlike and broad view of our future economic status and its requirements. We have drawn upon our natural resources in such a way as to invite attention to their necessary limit. This has properly aroused effort to conserve them, to avoid their waste, and to restrict their use to our necessity. We have so increased in population and in our consumption of food products and the other necessities of life hitherto supplied largely from our own country, that unless we materially increase our production we can see before us a change in our economic position from that of a country selling to the world food and natural products of the farm and forest to one consuming and importing them.

In a word, he fears that the consumption of our natural products in the raw state will soon reach the point where consumption has outstripped production and the products of the farm, forest, and ranch in the raw state will not meet the demands of the American manufacturer for the raw material, and therefore the producers of these articles will be in a position to demand and exact a protection on what they have to sell commensurate with what they have to buy. And in order to obviate this calamity to the manufacturers he proposes Canadian reciprocity. Now, I have never contended nor do I now contend that it is fair to tax or protect the manufacturer and leave the producer of the raw material at the mercy of the manufacturer. It is unjust and indefensible. On the other hand, I do not advocate the protection of the raw material. I advocate the freest possible interchange of the raw material produced in this country for the products of foreign countries, and also advocate the freest possible exchange of manufactured articles produced in this country for the products of foreign countries.

It is no argument from the Democratic standpoint to insist that because the manufactured article is protected that the raw material shall be protected, but it is in accord with the Democratic doctrine to vote for the unprotected raw material and then consistently to vote for the unprotected manufactured article. And if we are not in a position to say at which end of the line we begin, it is our duty to begin where we may and fight the principle to a finish.

This is merely a consideration thus far of the relation of the producer of the raw material, under the operation of the protective tariff, and the producer of the manufactured article under the same.

It does not take into account another great class. It does not take in account that great mass of American citizens who, as I have said before on this floor, do not own the farm, the forest, the ranch, or the mine to produce the raw material, nor the factory to produce the finished product. But is dependent upon his wage for the purchase of the necessities of life. And by what legislative enactment can he be protected?

Who is to name his wage? Who is to measure the income of every factory and then count the number of employees or measure their relative production, the output of that factory, and then by a just law measure the amount of protection the laborer is entitled to?

The greatest absurdity in all this argument is to give to the manufacturers of this country that tremendous protection from behind which they can extract a stipend from every American citizen upon the poor and specious plea that he, the manufacturer, will in his philanthropic heart find it to divide his spoils with his laborers. When has he done it? If he has, then the laborer is the chief of ingrates, because, in spite of laws passed in his favor, in spite of his best and dearest friend, his employer, he is still not satisfied. The law puts into the hands of the employer the power to accumulate millions, and then for fear that the Senate and the House may be too hard-hearted to deal justly with the laborer, they turn him over to the tender mercy of those who employ him, knowing full well that he, the employee, will get far greater justice at the hands of the trusts than he would get at the hands of the United States Senate and the House. I say he is an ingrate and not worthy of the consideration of either those who own the fields, forests, or mines to produce the raw material or those who own the factories to produce the finished product, if they receive all the advance in price through the effects of protection. Not a Senator on this floor believes he gets a tithe of it.

As a matter of course everything moves along the line of least resistance, and the great aim and object and desideratum of every man in business is to accumulate all the wealth he can; and in accumulating that wealth, the man who for reasons of policy is honest, but who in his heart is not, recks not who suffers while he is accumulating it. If the manufacturer with the highest possible protection can cut the wage of his employees in two and add this to the manufacturer's profit, who says he will not avail himself of the opportunity? I stand here and state without fear of being challenged that any man who can get the consent of his mind and the consent of his heart to help pass a law the operation of which he knows will enrich him at the expense of the balance of the American people has already gotten the consent of his mind to filch from his employees their just wage if he can do it without detriment to his business.

I want to state, Mr. President, that I shall not argue this upon the question of statistics. It makes no difference to me whether by the operation of this law my State and my business are to become doubly prosperous. I am arguing it upon the particular question of the relationship of the American citizen to the great problems that confront the American people. As I said before, there is no account taken of the wage-earning class in this great conflict, only, as I have indicated, that he is left at the sweet mercy of his employer, without any legal enactment to name how much wage shall be given out of any wares produced by any vocation or business in which he is employed.

There is not a business man, or a man possessed of common sense, who will attempt to deny that if the producer of the raw material is protected against importation of cheaper raw materials and the producer of the manufactured article is protected against the importation of cheaper manufactured articles, this wage earner—that is, if those duties are enforced and the prices made commensurate—has got to pay a double tax on what he consumes—the tax on the raw material to protect the producer of the raw material and a tax on the finished article to protect the manufacturer of the finished article. He pays them both, plus all the middlemen and their commissions.

The position assumed by some Democrats opposing this measure as to the attitude of other Democrats supporting this measure seems to be that we who are supporting it are attempting to take away from the producer of the raw material a certain benefit guaranteed him by tariff legislation, thereby giving the manufacturer an additional advantage. This is not my attitude, nor do I believe it is the attitude of any Democrat who is in favor of this measure. Were we in control of the Government, had we a majority in both House and Senate, and the President as well was a Democrat, as a matter of course we would begin this tariff reformation where the burden lay heaviest. But as we have not the Senate or the Executive it is wisdom on our part to follow the lead, or rather to accept the terms of a Republican administration which is in accord with Democratic doctrine, and follow it so long as it leads, in our judgment, in the proper direction, and whenever opportunity offers to work and vote for the removal of the oppressive burden imposed by the high protective tariff on the manufactured article.

It is idle to suppose that the friends of high protection on the manufactured articles, constituting perhaps a majority of the Senate, would consider any measure looking toward the removal of these high protective duties on manufactured articles. And in case they did, or rather in case there were enough Democrats and right-minded Republicans to pass such a bill, it goes without saying that the President would veto the same. Therefore, it is our duty to vote for the Canadian reciprocity, because it unquestionably is a step, if a short one, in the right direction, and when opportunity occurs we can make it longer, and if we come into power, make it to cover the entire question.

Therefore I repeat what has been said on this floor by others and possibly more forcefully than I can put it myself—it is our duty as Democrats to vote for everything that is moving in a Democratic direction, regardless of whence it came. I shall illustrate: A young man had spurned and scoffed at the religion and the faith of a poor, poverty-stricken old woman, who each morning and noon prayed for God to send her her daily bread. One evening, being without her daily meal, this young infidel in passing found her praying for food. He went off and brought her a sumptuous repast, and, slipping the door open, he shoved it in. Then, as the old woman raised up and looked, she said: "Thank God, He has answered my prayer and brought me my dinner." The young man said, "Old woman, I brought you that meal." She said, "I do not doubt it. God sent it, even if the devil brought it." [Laughter.] I am perfectly willing to accept reciprocity as a very good Democratic dinner to start on, even if the devil did bring it.

From a Democratic standpoint it is not becoming a Democrat, nor is it in accord with Democratic doctrine, to protest against the inequalities of the protective system as applied to commodities or communities. But it is his duty to fight the iniquity of the entire system.

I shall not claim that South Carolina has been discriminated against because she does not get her share of protection either on raw material or on the manufactured article; but I do claim that an injustice has been done South Carolina and the people of the United States by the operation of the iniquitous principle of high protection. I mean that in its fullest sense; I mean that even the beneficiaries of protection have suffered as well as the victims of it; for the reason that those who fell under the temptation of profiting by law at the expense of their neighbors have lost in civic righteousness and in the sense of justice and fair dealing more than can be atoned for by all the dollars they gained by the application of that law. No man can rise to the heights of perfect manhood who can get the consent of his mind to profit by the operation of an unjust law at the expense of his fellow citizen.

Therefore we who are fighting this battle of righteousness, though we fight it in poverty, as citizens we are richer than those who on the other side get the ill-gotten spoils, but have not the sense of civic righteousness and justice that we possess.

It is miserable sophistry, it is absurd and illogical to claim that high protection, a prohibitive tariff on manufactured articles, can benefit all the people. For just in proportion as the price of the manufactured article rises under the operation of the high-protective law, and the price of wages and the price of the raw material does not likewise advance, then it is a simple question of mathematics that the protected articles have enriched the producers thereof at the expense of those who purchase them. And it is not a question of enriching all the American people, but a question of shifting the wealth from the pockets of the many to the pockets of the few.

It has been claimed by the advocates of this high-protective system that under it we have prospered marvelously, developed wonderfully, and all because of protection. We have prospered in spite of, rather than by virtue of, the protective system. From the founding of the first English colony on American soil until 1776 we were under British rule—proprietary governments and a system of taxation that became at last intolerable—yet in that comparatively short period of time the Indians were overcome, the forests were cleared, fields were opened, and the American pioneers had, in spite of their oppression and these great difficulties, reached a point in material wealth where they were able to throw off the yoke of English oppression and gain their own freedom. This because of the vast resources of the New World. And no man can say what would have been the progress of America had the doctrine of comparative free trade, that is, a tariff for revenue only, obtained in place of the doctrine of high protection. And for more than a hundred years, practically without interruption, the doctrine of protection has obtained. It is true that we have accumulated vast wealth, widened and extended our agricultural domain, multiplied vastly our manufacturing enterprises, developed our mines, extended our railroad operations throughout the entire country, and yet in spite of all this general prosperity, it is a comment on the present system of government that the bitterest fight now confronting the American people is the fight against concentrated wealth. The hardest problem that confronts the statesman is the problem of solving and dissolving the trusts and combines, the legitimate offspring of this system which not only has laid its intolerable exactions upon the rank and file of the American people through legislation, but is threatening through its corrupt influence the very foundation of our republican institutions.

Just a few days ago the Standard Oil Co. was convicted by the courts of being guilty of an unrighteous combination in restraint of trade and ordered to dissolve. The Tobacco Trust was likewise haled into court and met a like fate, and, because of the lightness of the penalty, there is a suspicion in the minds of the American people that the court, which is the highest tribunal on the American Continent, did not in their decision keep faith with the American people. That is the legitimate offspring of the operation of an unholy law in our domestic, political, and economic life.

The Sugar Trust is an open scandal and a stench in the nostrils of right-thinking people. The Steel Trust extracting from the people such vast sums that even the organizer, the head and front of this protected and petted organization, is to-day demonstrating to the peoples of the world the righteousness, justice, and equity of the system of protection by being the possessor of such a vast fortune of ill-gotten gain that he is now busily engaged in finding some plausible means of making partial restitution to the Nation and the people that he helped to wrong. And it has been to the everlasting shame of the American Senate that one of their number has been tried for an alleged attempt to buy his seat in the United States Senate by corrupt practices, and it is further alleged that one of those most interested in his election was the head and front of the Lumber Trust of America. Thus, as said before, the evil of the system is not confined alone to those who suffer financially by the unjust burdens laid upon them, but those who suffer the moral degradation of benefiting by the unjust law.

As said before, we boast of our vast wealth. Who have been the producers of this vast wealth? Who have made possible this vast extension of railroad and manufacturing enterprises? It was necessarily the producer of the raw material, out of whose products the manufacturer necessarily, under protection, reaped his harvest of gold. The wealth of a country, so far as its circulating medium is concerned, is obtained by only two sources—the mining of its own monetary metals and the importation of gold from abroad in exchange for the surplus products exported. The export value of our agricultural and other unmanufactured products in the year 1910 amounted to $829,215,918. This vast sum, of course, was exported and sold upon the basis of competition or free markets. And out of this sum brought into this country an average of 41.52 per cent had to be given to the protected articles purchased in America.

To illustrate: The cotton raisers exported in 1910, $450,447,243 of the $829,215,918—the total aggregate of all exported articles unmanufactured, or more than half of all the exports of raw material in the year named. Yet they were forbidden, under this tariff, to buy where they sold what they needed and where they could have gotten it upon a parity with the price received for what they sold, and were forced to buy in America at practically double the price they would have had to pay for the same articles in the countries to which they exported this cotton. In other words, they were forced to bring $450,000,000 back to America and give to the protected manufacturer $450,000,000 for what they could have bought elsewhere for $225,000,000, thus being robbed of $225,000,000 for the benefit of the manufacturers. The same is true of the entire $829,000,000.

It is easily demonstrable from the foregoing figures, and others that might be added, that the raw material which has been produced in this country has been that out of which the protected manufacturers have grown so vastly rich. In the first place they bought their material for manufacturing purposes at comparatively free-trade prices, and then sold the articles manufactured out of this raw material at protected prices. The surplus of raw material sold abroad brought back to the producer the $800,000,000 spoken of before, which enabled him to buy so much more of the manufactured product; so that the manufacturer not only got a profit out of the purchase of the raw material and the sale of his manufactured goods, but he also got his protection profit out of the $800,000,000 raw material which was sold to foreigners. Now, as said before, this is indefensible. It has been indefensible for 122 years.

It is openly admitted by the friends of protection that the farmer up to the present has not received any benefit from the tariff. And that in the case of grain, Canada is a competitor and is rapidly becoming the most formidable rival of American wheat growers. It is also stated that the production of American wheat is not keeping pace with American consumption, and that therefore the time has now arrived when the American farmer in the form of the wheat producer stands to realize a substantial profit from the operation of the tariff by virtue of the fact, as indicated by the President in his message, that we are soon to become importers of the raw material, rather than exporters. This means, of course, that when the time shall arrive that the American consumption has so far outstripped American production that the supply of the domestic raw material is not sufficient to meet the needs of the manufacturers of the finished article, that the producers of these raw materials will have an opportunity to demand protection commensurate with the protection that they pay.

The argument of the high protectionist has been to foster infant industries until such time as they shall grow and become able to furnish a sufficiency for all the American people, and then in the next breath, in the case of wheat, they argue that because it has become exhausted, exploited, and can not meet the requirements of the people, therefore it is to be protected. It seems as if we were running a pension bureau and a kindergarten under the same law.

It seems that in order to obviate this great calamity the President conceived the reciprocity idea. The opponents of reciprocity point out this injustice, and it is plausible. Amendments were offered by different Senators seeking to give relief, or claiming to be seeking to give relief, by providing that as the farmer had under this reciprocity to come into competition with Canada with what he had to sell, that the manufacturers of America should be brought in like competition with Canadian manufacturers in the articles that the farmer had to buy. In other words, if what he had to sell was put practically upon the basis of free trade, what he had to buy should be put upon a like basis. The President himself says in his message that, so far as the textiles are concerned, the Canadian manufacture of these are a negligible quantity, and need not be taken into account. This is practically true of Canadian manufactures in general in relation to the needs of the American farmer. Therefore the Democratic House, believing that reciprocity was a step toward the Democratic doctrine of freer intercourse with one nation, at least in the raw material of the two countries without, as the President says, an "obstructive and prohibitive" tariff, and knowing as they did that the area of Canada was larger than the area of the United States, and that the possibilities of her agricultural products along certain lines were practically unlimited, that if the farmer were given free trade as to Canadian manufactures, it would in no sense compensate him for the protected duties on the articles that he had to buy; therefore, independent from the reciprocity bill, they introduced the free-list bill, which does not restrict its terms to Canada, but extends them to every country from which there is a possibility of imports for the farmer's benefit. Therefore it seems to me the becoming attitude of a Democrat is to vote for the Canadian reciprocity bill, and then, if he believes that the farmer has suffered under that bill, to vote for the free-list bill, which gives him a commensurate relief for that which he suffers under reciprocity.

It is misleading and absurd to say to the farmers of this country that they are getting the proper relief by making manufactured articles of Canadian production free. It sounds well in a speech, but would be absolutely disappointing, null, and void in practice. His only hope of relief is having the privilege of selling in any market where he can sell highest and buying in any market where he can buy the cheapest, and be rid of the protective law, behind which is easily organized the greedy money power in this country, who, without competition from abroad, stifle competition at home and extract what profits they please. I do not believe that the rank and file of American farmers believe in or advocate protection, for the reason that were they given a protection, being so numerous, so difficult to organize, and as a class so poor, they could never hope to cope with the few and wealthy manufacturers who buy their products. These manufacturers, in spite of a tariff duty, could and would organize and fix the price of the field products and, taking advantage of the farmer's poverty and necessity, force him to that price. This has been the history of the relationship of the two—the producer of the raw material and the producer of the manufactured article—for all these years. The manufacturer has accumulated capital, organization, almost unlimited credit, while the farmer has practically none of these. And it is idle to talk about the farmer being the beneficiary of a protected tariff. His only hope, his only relief is in removing the high protection from what he has to buy and forcing those who sell to him into competition with the world. And this is the Democratic doctrine. It may be that reciprocity seeks to cheapen the raw material for the manufacturer. The Democratic free-list bill seeks to cheapen the manufactured article to the farmer. The one applies to Canada, where the farmer's greatest competitor is; the other applies to the entire foreign world, where his relief is. And it is almost unthinkable how any Democrat, knowing that the farmer may not hope to benefit by protection, can seriously object to the Canadian reciprocity or refuse to support the free-list bill.

I invite the farmer to join forces with those of us who are his friends and remove the protective duties that have cursed him through all these years.

I want to say right in this connection, Mr. President, that we do not fool the farmer any more. The crowds that we meet on the hustings to-day are not as were the crowds we met 15 and 20 years ago. The processes of education, the facilities for transportation and communication, have advanced so rapidly, the price of transportation has become so reduced, the means and opportunity of acquiring knowledge have become so much easier, the free rural delivery and the schoolhouses have been so improved that they have made it so that the man in the woods is becoming as cosmopolitan as the man who walks the city streets. He knows what he needs and why he does not get it, and he knows who is the perpetrator of those laws that forbid his getting it.

Before I leave this phase of the subject, I want to call your attention to the fact that only a few days ago there was printed in the newspapers of this country an estimate of the probable grain yield and cotton yield of the American fields. On the 25th day of June these reports were published, before most of the cotton was up in a great many southern fields. The acreage was estimated, the yield per acre was estimated, and then the probable yield, counted in bales, was estimated. For whose benefit? The estimate was of one and one-half million bales more than has ever been made in the history of cotton growing—and that, too, before the cotton is up.

What was the result? The price broke $7.50 a bale. For whose benefit? This dear object—the farmer—around which both Democrats and Republicans have rallied on this floor to save him from competition with Canada, when right here in Washington there emanated from one of our departments a report, based upon worse than a guess, that extracted $7.50 per bale from the value of the cotton which the farmer had labored to make without a cent of protection and out of which had come more than half of the exports of the raw material that save the balance of trade in favor of America. Yet this estimate is made for whom? I do not say—I have no right, perhaps, to say—that it was the distinct purpose and object of those making this estimate to injure or benefit anyone. But what was the result? What were the conditions? Year before last there was a short crop of cotton; last year there was a short crop of cotton; and under the eternal divine law of supply and demand the price rose to where it measured something above the cost of production. Stocks of cotton were low; the warehouses of the manufacturers were empty, and their profits necessarily were being cut down until such time as they could raise the price of manufactured articles to recoup themselves for what they had unexpectedly lost in having to pay the advanced price of the raw material. Just at that period, furthest removed from the exhaustion of the old crop and the coming in of the new crop, in the great trying time from the middle of June to the middle of July, to the middle of August, to the middle of September, representing three months—just in the nick of time, when manufacturers were being forced to shut down because of the scarcity of the raw material and because of the high prices under God's law—then comes this report that in 60 or 90 days probably the biggest crop that America ever saw would be coming to market. To whose benefit did it inure? To the benefit of the farmer or manufacturer?

Need I call your attention to what occurred here just two short years ago, when the crop was short, when the mills were clamoring for cotton, and those who produced it were selling it in open competition with all the other cotton-producing countries of the world? The price soared and soared because Japan and England and other countries of Europe were clamoring for the staple. Some men organized in New York to put prices down, and sold hundreds of thousands of bales that they did not own. Other men bought them, and when "notice day" came they that bought demanded the delivery of spot cotton. What had they done? They had gone to the mills that converted cotton into cloth, and that needed the cotton, and these men who had bought demanded not a settlement upon margin but the delivery of actual cotton. What happened? The Attorney General secured an indictment against the men who were attempting to help the mills that wanted cotton and the farmers who wanted a better price under the law of supply and demand. They were indicted because it was alleged they had organized in restraint of trade, while there was not a whisper against that combination which had sold what they did not own in order to depress the price of the legitimate product of the American farmer. How many voices were raised on this floor——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina if it is not true that all that Frank Hayne and those men did was to demand that the contract should be literally complied with?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was all. I had affidavits to that effect. The Senate did rise on that occasion to the demands of the case and passed a resolution which I had introduced demanding that the Attorney General should investigate the other side of the question, so as to ascertain who sold this cotton in restraint of trade. His reply, in polite terms, was that nobody had indicted them, that his office was to take cases which were presented before his department, and to give us the law, and not to investigate. Yet we sit here and plead for the much-loved farmer when in our hearts we know that the plea we are making is spurious and will result in no good to him. But when there comes a real bona fide case in which legislation would help him, and not at the expense of other people, the silence of this body is eloquent.

Mr. President, I want to state, in conclusion, that protection presupposes the power to take advantage of the law, else it could never protect. The very assumption of protection is that those protected can take advantage of the law; and protection under the law in reference to commerce means prohibition. If it did not prohibit, it would not protect. Therefore it presupposes that the party protected can take advantage of it to the full extent of that protection. Had the manufacturers been as numerous as the farmer, as different in degrees of education, wealth, and general intelligence, protection never could have benefited him to the degree that it now does. Each and every one recognizes this fact. And it is a reflection upon American statesmanship for them to plead for the passage of a law which, when passed, could not, by the very nature of the case, give the benefit promised therein to the farmer.

Therefore, Mr. President, I shall vote for the Canadian reciprocity bill, believing that it will not materially change the price of any article, but will open the way and set the example for the further application of the Democratic doctrine for the freest possible intercourse between us and the nations of the earth with which we deal, and begin that legislation which will levy a duty simply for the support of the Government economically administered. If in the course of the present great Democratic wave we should come into power, I hope that no Democrat will stand upon this floor and plead that in the readjustment of the duties in order to be fair to the farmers of this country they must be provided for under a scheme of revenue duties to give them protection. If we can raise the revenues of this country without laying oppression on the great mass of the consumers, although we give incidental protection to a few on the nonessentials of life, I for one shall vote for all raw materials to be free, if it will help the American people. I am not going to pin my faith to the temporary doctrine, ephemeral in its nature, that we must have a revenue tariff, and that alone, or that we are to have free trade. I am going to favor that policy which will raise such revenue as, in our judgment, under the Constitution would best serve the interests of all the American people, put upon the free list that which in our judgment would give the greatest benefit to the greatest number, and lay the burden where it can be best borne, without adding any further taxes to the people. I am not pleading for reciprocity because I desire to add to the burden of the farmer, but to put him in the right light, in the honest light, in the light of a true democratic American citizen with relation to the nations of the earth; and then I shall vote to remove the iniquitous protective duties on the manufactured articles that have been the burden that he has had to bear and that no protection for him can ever alleviate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have been put upon inquiry. As I have listened to the discussion of the question involving the rights of the American citizen my mind has reached out to inquire what is it to be an American citizen? Is there any difference between being an American citizen and being a dweller only in the land or living outside of it and owing allegiance to some other country? What is the object and purpose of a government if it is not to confer an especial advantage upon those who constitute it, those who found it, maintain it, defend it, and support it?

I have listened for long weeks and months here to political cheeseparing, to see just how thin the protection which the American citizen claims may be shaved down, to see how thin the ice might be made over which he must pass with his burdens and duties upon him, and I have concluded that there is a misapprehension in the minds of some Senators, due to what I know not, as to what it is to be an American citizen, to be a part owner in every inch of the land and in the waters under the jurisdiction of our Government, to be a part owner in every opportunity that may be wrested from natural conditions. Is there nothing in all of this that should and does distinguish an American citizen from a citizen of another country seeking to do business under the advantageous conditions belonging to this country? I have always thought there was; the founders of our Government thought there was; they believed when they entered upon the soil of America that out of that would grow a substantial right that would attach itself to every human attribute of citizenship, which right would be greater than that which could be obtained by any other person than a citizen of the United States.

They did not enter upon this great country through the cities. They entered through the farms and the forests. The cities are an incident of civilization, and not the basis of it. The country must first exist in a productive condition before a city can exist at all. So that we are naturally inclined to look over the real pathway upon which the tread of empire has come.

The forests were the first useful adjunct to those who came here. They sheltered them until they could appeal to the soil or its products to sustain them. They lived in the forests, and, reaching out, gathered the natural opportunity from them to make their homes. The bark shelter first, the cave in the side of the bank covered with boughs, the rude shelter of the trees, God's first tabernacle, as some one has called them, were the beginning of that which we know to-day as the civilization of the people; and it is that out of which the rights of an American citizen have grown, and grown greater than the rights of any other person on the earth.

Now, let us see if we can not stand out in the open and consider this question briefly from that standpoint—not see how merely tolerable the condition of the American citizen may be maintained in order that he will not leave the country, but see how fully he may enjoy the natural fruit of that which is his own.

You might imagine from some suggestions which have been made that this American citizen was a suppliant at the door of charity; that he has no natural right against the foreigner engaged in competitive enterprises; that he must show himself capable of living within the sphere of the life against which he is competing; that he must show himself capable of existing under the conditions of life that surround his opponent. That is not the rule by which to estimate the rights of those whose rights are at issue in this matter. The people who are the competitors of the American citizen do not build the homes in the country nor the buildings in the cities; they do not lay out the empire and construct it according to the great plan that marks it to-day and will mark it in the future; they assume no responsibility for the payment of taxes to maintain the Government; they assume no responsibility to defend the country against an enemy, to preserve its integrity; they have none of those expenses; and yet men stand up in this responsible place and in this hour and demand that the foreigner shall have equal rights in a market that has been paid for and maintained by American citizens.

They do not even pay a license to transact business in this country. They send their products in through the customhouses of our country, the very officers of which are maintained and paid out of the Public Treasury. They send them onto wharves and into customhouses that were builded out of the Treasury of the United States, into which they never contributed a dollar for construction or maintenance. Yet they claim equal rights with our citizens, and men stand up here—American citizens—and say that the American business world should be compelled to match pennies with these competitors on even terms.

I want to speak, first, for an interest which is now the largest interest and which was the first business enterprise and interest in America. It is larger than any other to-day; it pays more in wages; and yields more in returns than any other. That is the lumber interest. It had its foundation when the first man in America cut a tree for the accommodation and use of himself or his neighbor, to construct the first home. It is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the civilization we enjoy. No industry is more necessary. We must be sheltered; we must have lumber for a mutiplicity of purposes, impossible to enumerate upon such an occasion as this.

Is it not, then, well enough, when an industry is threatened, to pause long enough to investigate the conditions which surround it and those that threaten it? There are more men, wage earners, engaged in the lumber business than in any other enterprise under our Government. I have made a careful examination of the official and reliable figures, and I have no hesitation in making that statement. There are but three enterprises known to the American people that represent a larger financial result or a larger product than the lumber business. I desire to be accurate. The lumber product of last year amounted to $827,464,656. That was made up of two items. It was made up of lumber proper—what we call sawed lumber—and of finished lumber from the planing mill. The value of the first amounted to $580,022,690, and the value of the planing-mill product amounted to $247,441,956. I will give the wages account, but first the number of employees. There were 413,000 men, according to the official figures, engaged in the production of that lumber as distinguished from the planing-mill product, and there were 97,674 employees in the planing mills, making practically about 510,000 men—and they are all men. There is no woman labor, and there is no foreign labor worth mentioning; there is only one mill in the Northwest that employs any, and those employees are men. That, counting 5 to a family, which is in the United States always a low estimate, represents 2,000,000 people, or more, whose existence and whose ability to maintain the standard of American citizenship rest upon that industry. There is no other industry that comes near it in the number of employees.

I have the steel industries tabulated, and I will give some of them right in that connection. I will give it by product, because the ratio is common throughout. Here are the bread and bakery products. Now, this is, as compared with the lumber products, $827,464,656. First, I take the flour and grist mill products, which cover wheat and all that goes into the bread. That is $713,033,395. It is over $100,000,000 less than lumber. Take the foundries and machine shops of the United States, and it is $799,862,588. It is far below the lumber business.

I am seeking to determine the importance of this industry, because we must keep that in mind in view of the fact that the importance of the industry bears the relation that it does to the financial proposition as to the earnings of those who are engaged in it.

The car construction of the United States amounts to $309,863,499. That is less than half the amount of the lumber products.

Bread and bakery products, $269,609,061. That is less than half the lumber product.

The product of all the clothing makers of the United States amounts to $355,796,571; about half that of lumber.

I take cotton goods. Those engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods in all of its branches and ramifications produce products to the value of $450,467,704.

Iron and steel workers and the products thereof. That is the first item that matches up with the lumber business. The amount is $905,787,733. These are the figures given out by the Government of the United States.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield in just a moment, when I finish the table, so that it will appear consecutively.

Meats. Those engaged in the production of meats in all of its ramifications come next to that, and the amount is $801,757,137.

Pig iron, $419,175,000.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I merely wish to ask what census reports those figures are taken from?

Mr. HEYBURN. From the last census. I took them from the Yearbook of 1910. I checked the figures with the other publications and statistics I have here and in my committee room.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to state that the statistics of the cotton manufactures for the year 1910 show $616,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is for the year 1909; and it was greater for 1910. I have given it credit for $820,000,000. I took the figures from the Government publication. It is greater than the Senator from Rhode Island suggests. I think there was a falling off this year in the cotton product.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think the Senator has the figures confused. I think the figures he has given for the cotton product are the figures for 1905. The figures for the year 1910 are $616,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, that is two hundred million less than I have given it credit for.

Mr. LIPPITT. I thought you gave the cotton manufactures at $400,000,000——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; $820,320,000. I have the figures before me.

Mr. LIPPITT. Is that cotton?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is cotton.

Mr. LIPPITT. Or lumber?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the lumber is $827,464,656. Those are the official figures of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. What did the Senator give for the meat product?

Mr. HEYBURN. For the meat product, $801,757,137. It stands less than lumber and less than iron and steel. Of course, I have grouped the iron and steel industries. That is more than a fair presentation of that industry, because it is separable and is maintained in a separable way from a business standpoint. But I grouped them because the figures are not so very great as to make a bad showing.

Now, I have taken bituminous coal—only half of what lumber is—and anthracite. Bituminous is $405,486,477 and anthracite is $149,415,847, making the two classes of coal amount to $554,902,624. You see it is not much over half the lumber product.

Then I have taken petroleum in all of its classes. The amount is $128,248,783, a mere bagatelle as compared with the lumber product of the country.

Then I have taken hay, which ranks high. The amount is $747,769,000. Had I time I would like to pause here long enough to point out the iniquity of placing hay upon the free list. It is the first crop. It is the grubstake of the pioneer. He gets the benefit of the hay before he gets a benefit from any other resource of his land. He may cut a crop of hay in many sections of the country, but he can always pasture it. It is available to him in the interval between his settlement or his entry and the first crop that he may grow. We have millions and millions of acres and thousands and thousands of people to-day on the frontier in this country—and, unfortunately for this measure, that frontier is near the line that is to be obliterated, they tell us—who will depend upon the first crop of wild hay.

We have the testimony taken before the Finance Committee here. There is the testimony of Mr. Hagenbarth, a man who was born in Idaho and is now past middle life, who is one of the largest stock raisers in the State. He states how in the early days they depended upon this wild hay for their animals. It was the basis of their prosperity and their business enterprise. They soon became raisers of what we would call tame hay, as distinguished from wild hay. They speak of it always as tame hay. One of the largest enterprises in that northwest country is hay. More land is being put under cultivation for the purpose of raising hay now than for any other purpose in a large portion of that country. It is, of course, a very much better grade of hay. It is hay that can be fed to all classes of animals or ground for human food, and is being so treated. Yet they are going to open the Canadian fields to compete with those pioneers who have entered upon this enterprise.

I will not stop long at any item in this question, because the hour is late and we unfortunately or fortunately, as it may be, have a short time left in which to consider this measure. I am not one of those who believe that men's minds are closed against reason. I will always give them the credit, in my judgment, of being open to conviction. Otherwise I doubt if I would say a word.

I was dealing with this question of wages and I sidetracked for the purpose of comparing the importance of the production itself. Now, let us go to the question of wages, and I have those figures here accurately stated. The total wages paid to the 506,000 persons engaged in this lumber business last year, to those brought in connection with what we call the rough lumber, was $183,021,519, and to those engaged in the finishing mills, $197,000. The number of establishments reported upon by the Government was 25,000. The average number of wage earners in those establishments was 413,000, and in the planing mills it was 97,674, making a total of about 506,000 people engaged in the lumber business accounted for by the Government.

Take 506,000 men and they represent a population of over 2,000,000 on the accepted basis of estimate. That many people producing this vast predominating product receiving over $200,000,000 in wages is an item in the economy of government that can not be overlooked. So I do not feel that I am open to the charge of talking of small questions or small interests.

The question really before us is, Shall that industry remain an American industry or shall it be transferred to some other country, either upon business reasons or sentimental ones? That is the serious question.

The existing duty on lumber affected by the proposed change is an ad valorem duty of 7 per cent. So far as the dressed lumber is concerned it is less affected, but so affected as to make the difference of the wages represented by this production.

This Canadian bill is drawn upon the proposition of leaving the wages in Canada. There is no man who understands anything of government or of economics in government who does not recognize that the wages is the basis of every man's fortune. I do not care whether it is in Government bonds or whether it is in lands or in business enterprise, it is the result of wages, and it is at the mercy of those who work for wages. The pay roll is the essential question in the economics of our country. A community without a pay roll is a self-consuming community. The pay roll represents the accretion of wealth; it represents the distribution of wealth; it represents the initiation and the growth of other kindred business enterprises that sustain the wageworker. One man may own the factory or the business enterprise that represents millions of dollars of investment, but he is only one man. He consumes the share of one man and he votes but once. Under him are a thousand men, representing the virility of a thousand citizens of the United States in the family life, in the building of the necessary home for him to live in with his family, in the construction and bringing together of the commercial establishment in which he shall spend a portion of his wages, in the bringing together of a commercial establishment that shall make a demand upon the surrounding country, and the land and those who inhabit it, for the production of the things pertinent to the occupancy of that land, that reaches out and builds a civilization that extends first a mile or two, then other miles, and others, until out of the condition of the first man's employment has grown the necessity for railroads to bring in and take out of that community. Multiplying these conditions you have the great Government of to-day which grew out of the first commercial transaction between the first settlers among themselves, and then extending like the ever-widening circle as others came.

When you fail to remember the genesis of government then you are incapacitated from dealing with the perfected government. You must know it, because the early history is as much a part of the history to be considered as that of this hour. You must know it as you know your business enterprise, from its foundation, and you must never forget the foundation.

Here we are confronted with this great business proposition. It is proposed to open the great opportunities that represent this proposition of the running business to the competition of strangers, to competition with the noncontributing, nonproducing citizenship of another country, that know not our traditions or our laws or our flag, that know only that in any hour through the human passions they may be an aggressive enemy. We do not need to consider that in this hour, except that it is one of the conclusions which flows from the other.

Are you going to open the door to those people? I care not how kindly, I care not if they are of a common ancestry, I care not what their sympathies are; this is a business proposition. Government is business. Patriotism is sentiment, but the crystallization of patriotism is the business of government, the practical side of it. We are here to deal with that side of it, and if we forget it we forget our duty.

Is there any doubt that the lumber business would dwindle, and that it would stop if a country having practically an equal supply of that material were given an equal or a better chance than our own people? An American requires a little better chance in this world than any foreigner. An American stands firmer on his feet and he holds his head a little higher. He houses and clothes and educates his family better, and they maintain a standard of living above that of any other people on earth, it matters not where you look for them. Men who have gone about the earth will have no doubt about it. I do not mean to say that every American citizen is up to the standard, but I am speaking of the average citizenship, and you will find the average citizenship not in the cafés and around the boulevards of the city; you will find the average citizen in the field of applied industry. The question is, Shall we keep up to that standard, and shall we provide an income and an occupation for the people that will enable them to live up to it, or shall we say to them, "Look over there, the people of this country or that manage to get along, the sun shines on them and the rains fall, and they seem to live happily; they do not have the things that you have, but they get along with what they have, why can you not do it?"

Is that the way you talk to an American citizen? He will rise up and strike down his representatives who speak to him in that way. He does not select representatives to place him in competition with people who can live or who choose to live on meat once a week, and I could name a number of things upon which the people of other nations live.

I do not desire to be invidious against any people, even though they are not here. But I do not need to be specific. It has been the boast of the American that every generation has been somewhat in advance of the generation to which he belonged, and that they will advance in that way always to a higher plane of civilization, a more equal distribution of the blessings of civilization, and a grander equality in the field of endeavor. That is the boast and dream and properly the ambition of the American people. Are you tending toward that when you are comparing them in their industrial enterprises with the possibilities of nations that know nothing of the attributes which place the American citizen thus in the forefront of civilization?

I am not going to stand here and quote prices between Liverpool and Milwaukee or St. Paul or Chicago. If there is a doubt about it, I will solve the doubt with a margin large enough to cover the lean years. As the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] aptly said this afternoon, we must take into consideration the lean years with the fat years, when this year or another the people had bumper crops and splendid conditions, and prospered and made a big margin. That is in the providence of human kind the rule that should appertain, because, forsooth, to-morrow they may have lean crops and lean conditions. The establishment and maintenance of a high standard of uniformity that shall be able always to have in reserve enough to overcome and avoid the effects of lean years is the only principle for the individual or the government to rest upon.

Take 7 per cent to-day off of lumber and allow the forests of Canada to become the competitor of the American market for the forests and those who are rightly engaged in them, and you will put out of business, if not 500,000 men and their families, enough of them to rebuke those who are responsible for it, to rebuke them wherever they may be found, whether in high place or in low.

Then, again, when you turn a man out of his chosen field of labor, you do not only that man a wrong but you do a wrong to some other man whose place he will strive for. You have set two men agoing—the man who is out of a job and the man whose job is sought by that man. Multiply that. I have seen it and so has every man within the sound of my voice. I have seen a thousand men turned out of their employment within 48 hours, with an assurance that until governmental conditions changed they could not hope for reemployment. I have seen them go down into the fields where other men were at work and bid against men for the employment they had. They bring about discontent among the men in other fields. If they succeed in underbidding one set of men and driving them out, they in turn become the invaders of other men's field of action, until you have the condition that was represented by Coxey's army.

I saw the first trainload of them leave Oakland, Cal., joyous and glad. I said: "Where are you going?" "Going to Washington." You would have thought they had been invited down here to a banquet. I saw them again at Portland, Oreg. They came up over the Southern Pacific. Their numbers were lessened and others had been substituted. Then I saw them when they reached Spokane.

I saw them trying to cross the lake on logs pushed in from the mills, hundreds of men sitting astride logs paddling themselves with their hands, going to Washington to change the Government. They had helped to wreck its business conditions, and they thought they could change them by coming down here. I saw some of them, as the weeks and months went on, strung out on the roads between here and there on brake beams, on the top of cars, seizing trains. I saw them here in Washington.

That is the result of just exactly such things as are proposed now. The first of those men were put out of employment in California because the business in which they were employed was made unprofitable by governmental action. Then, again, as that condition spread over the country it repeated and multiplied itself. Our mines were closed down because the duty on lead was cut in two, and only the very highest grade of lead could be mined. Millions of tons of it went over the dump as waste that under ordinary conditions would have gone to the smelter with a profit. The men were consequently let out. I saw those men go on the road. It was the saddest spectacle of my life. They were men I had known. They were hard-working men. They were men with families. There was not an element of the tramp in them. But with them it was anything.

Now, do you want to bring that condition about? You can turn 20,000 men out of employment, with the families they represent, by closing down the lumber interests in our part of the country, and I speak only of three States—Idaho, Washington, and Oregon. We are the largest lumber producers. Washington is the largest lumber producer in the United States. Washington produces 60 per cent of all the shingles made in the United States, and they ship them all over the Atlantic coast.

Oregon comes next. Idaho is an important lumber-producing State. It is now proposed to turn those men out of employment. Can it be wondered that I stand here at this late hour and under these untoward conditions and speak for this interest, speak against its disturbance? How many men in the ordinary or the extraordinary walks of life know anything about this great enterprise? The most they see is a lumber yard; they may see a mill out of a car window; but they should go into the country where this industry is located. In the State of Washington the lumber interest is greater than every other interest in the State combined, and with $10,000,000 to spare. Just think of exposing it to the competition of another country, I care not what the character of its citizenship may be; I care not what the sympathies existing may be; I will not enter into a consideration of that. If they were our brothers, outside of our household it should be as it is in the household. The Government is the household of the American people, and you expose them to this foreign competition. You are not taking anything from the other man in that respect. He has nothing to give you that can profit you, and that which you propose to give him is a dagger of destruction; it is a weapon with which to strike you. You give him the right to enter your market. Our right to enter his market is of no value. We send none of the class of lumber that is affected by this legislation into Canada. We might send, and we do send, rough-sawed lumber, but if we put any work upon it the Canadians will not allow it to come into their country, and very properly so. They are sensible. They want the wages represented by the manufacture of that lumber on their side.

If we have the good judgment that should mark our action, we will see to it that anything that is the result of wages and that results in pay rolls shall stay on this side of the line. All there is of the wealth of our country is the pay roll. Eighty per cent—yes, 90 per cent—of the money in the banks of our country to-day is held there against pay rolls—I am talking about money, and not lead pencils—80 or 90 per cent of it is held there in order to pay labor. I class with labor the producer of commodities; I class with labor the men who make any part of a product that is assembled by other men. They are as much laborers as are the men who pour the sand in the mold.

Mr. President, I want to put that question very squarely, and in order that no man may ever have an excuse for not understanding it, I want to give you the benefit of the testimony that was taken by the Finance Committee. I have stated the result of much of that testimony. The facts I have stated are taken largely from the testimony and the official documents. Here is the voucher for what I said about the class of lumber which goes to Canada. Those who have spoken seem to think that we are going to be able to ship a great deal of lumber into Canada. It is a class of lumber that we can sell anywhere in the world; we do not need the Canadian market for it. This is what we call high-grade lumber. Mr. Bloedel, who is probably as well informed a man as there is in the United States on this subject, a man of such responsibility and such experience as that his word is taken on any question that he chooses to speak upon, says—

> The price of the high-grade lumber has increased—

That is in response to a question—

> high-grade clears and finish, such as would enter into the construction of the panels of that door—they have advanced from about $18 to $24.

This was in response to a question looking to a probe of the question of high living:

> Flooring has advanced from about $18 to $25, showing the fact that the increased production has made more common lumber than could be sold and less clear lumber proportionately.

A tree is largely rough lumber; but only a small percentage of every tree or of any tree is what you would call clear, first-class lumber. When you are seeking to fill an order to cut a lot of high-grade lumber you must necessarily produce several times that quantity of low-grade lumber and glut your market. When the mills have an order for such lumber as would bear transportation from the West to the East or into a foreign country, they are compelled to cut so much other lumber—what we call common lumber—in order to get the clear lumber that it gluts the market and they sell it at a loss.

Men who came before the committee have been scoffed at because they appeared to be prosperous men and yet testified that they had lost $1.05, or thereabouts, on the standard lumber which they had cut; but they explained how they were compelled to sell that class of lumber at a loss because they had been compelled to produce it in order to get a class of lumber which was profitable enough to balance against the loss. I have heard that discussed quite recently in the Senate here, and no attention at all was given to the explanation. The same is true of nearly every class of business in the United States.

Mr. President, I will give you some facts in regard to this class of labor. Mr. Bloedel, in speaking of the advance in lumber in 1907, says that it went from 40 cents a hundred to 50 cents a hundred, and other advances in proportion, that seemed like unholy advances, and some immediately jumped to the conclusion that a trust had been formed to advance the price of lumber, when the fact was, as explained by Mr. Bloedel, that—> the increased capacity created an abnormal demand for labor. The result was that our average price for labor advanced very rapidly—I mean our average cost of labor. We paid, I should say, in 1905, about $2 for common labor, and we paid as high as $3 a day for common labor in the height of that season in 1907.

There was an advance of a dollar a day in the cost of labor. He continues:

> There is another item that enters into that, and it is not alone the cost of labor but the efficiency. The efficiency of labor diminished proportionately to the increase in the pay for the reason that there is such a demand for men that they are very independent and will not perform as willing labor or as much labor for the money as on a lower basis.

Then he goes on and speaks of the timber in Idaho. I need only say that Idaho stands right up in the forefront of the timber-producing States. It has increased its capacity from 10,000,000 feet in 1890 to over 1,300,000,000 feet in the last year; and it has the same interest in this question as have other States. It borders on the Canadian line. Logs and lumber can be floated into Idaho and Washington by water or brought by rail. There are four railroads crossing the line there in the immediate vicinity of the lumber production.

Mr. Bloedel says that the average cost of lumber is over $8 per thousand. That is just for labor on the lower grades. They do not expect to make any money on the lower grades of lumber. He gives here the figures as to increased production in Idaho. I find I misstated them. In Mr. Bloedel's testimony at page 714 he says that in 1899 the production of lumber in Idaho was 165,000,000 feet, while in 1909, 10 years later, it was 1,500,000,000 feet.

The freight on that lumber to Minnesota transfer points is 42 cents per 100 pounds. Of course that is a fluctuating rate, because all lumber does not weigh the same per foot, but it averages about $10 per thousand feet for freight from our mills to Minnesota transfer points, which mean Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, and all of those States.

Now, I desire to call attention to a fact that appears upon the face of this bill. Why it should be there I can not understand, because it is impossible that those who drew it should not have understood what they were doing.

At present rough lumber is admitted into Canada free. They want rough lumber upon which to expend labor and create wages. On dressed and matched lumber the duty is 25 per cent ad valorem. The proposed duty on lumber imported into the United States is, when surfaced on two sides, 75 cents, while in Canada it would be 25 per cent ad valorem, which, on the basis of $8 per thousand, would amount to $2, so that that lumber when sent into Canada would pay $2 a thousand feet, while the same kind of lumber brought from Canada into the United States would pay 75 cents. In the case of flooring, for instance, they would pay a duty of $1.12, while we would pay a duty of $6.25, so that there is nothing reciprocal about that.

Now, to get some idea of the reason for the cost of our lumber when it comes east, I will state that common undressed lumber sells at the mills for $7 a thousand. The freight on it to North Dakota is $10.40. The handling and profit—what might be called the overhead charges, and they are numerous—amount to $3.48, making the cost of that lumber in North Dakota and what we call Missouri shipping points $20.88. They complain of the price of lumber being $20. That lumber is sold to them for less than $20, notwithstanding that it cost upward of $20.88; but the clear lumber which is sent through the planers and finishers is sold for enough profit in another market to enable the lower grades of lumber to be sold at that price. It seemed to be a mystery that needed clearing up as to how we could go on from year to year cutting millions and hundreds of millions of feet of lumber at a loss.

Rough timber at the same mill on the same date cost $9. That is the price at which the lumber is billed to the purchaser; but it costs more than that. The freight to North Dakota on that class of lumber is $13.20; handling and profit 20 per cent, or $4.44, making a total of $26.64.

The changes were rung on the fact that lumber of that class cost $26 or $27; and it was said that the high price was due to the Lumber Trust. That lumber had cost much more than $26.64 to those who shipped it, but they had taken their profit out of the cream—that is, the small proportion of clear lumber that would stand finishing and grooving and working up and polishing as lumber is prepared for the higher classes of work in a building for finishing, for doors and sashes, and a thousand other things.

There has been some talk about the mill prices of lumber having gone up because the lumber business has gone into the hands of a trust. In 1902 the price of common lumber, both board and dimension, in our mills was $8 a thousand; in 1903 it was $8.50; in 1904 it was $7; in 1905 it was $5.50; in 1907 it was $12.50; and in 1908, $10.50, owing to the demands made in consequence of the San Francisco and Valparaiso earthquakes. Those cities had to be rebuilt. The question was not "When can you let us have some lumber?" It was, "We want the lumber; get your force to work at any cost or expense and get us the lumber quickly." It was hurry up from the beginning. Men took advantage of that situation. Wages were raised a dollar a day; the railroads took advantage of it and raised their rates; everybody took advantage of it; and the mills had to put these charges in their bills; but they made no more money on that lumber than they did on lumber they had to sell the month before for $5.50. That condition lasted during the two years of the reconstruction of those two cities, both destroyed from the same cause.

In 1909, when that fever had passed away, lumber was again $7 at the mill; in 1910 it was $7; and now, in 1911, it is $6.50. I have those figures from the mill. I read them into the RECORD because I think it is not only fair, but it is a duty to correct mistakes upon which men may act and be misled.

In 1909 in the State of Washington alone there were 4,200,000,000 feet of lumber made, one-third of which went east by rail, one-third was shipped by water, and one-third was used locally. That country is growing, and uses just about that proportion of the lumber that it cuts. It has supplied itself and other States dependent upon it. It has supplied the great Middle West with lumber and built it up, and it is still able to ship out two-thirds of its product.

The total value of all agricultural products in the State of Washington is only $40,000,000. The wages paid in Washington alone for the production of lumber in 1909 amounted to $60,000,000, disseminated throughout the business world of the Northwest. Washington, Idaho, and Oregon last year produced 7,500,000,000 feet of lumber, employed 190,000 men in the lumber industry and paid them wages of $127,000,000.

Those figures are reliable. You can see from them why that country is prosperous. It can stand financial drought. They are not bothering very much about the disturbance of business conditions out there. They have the wealth which they are are gathering from their natural resources.

This whole bill is framed upon the basis of free raw materials, and the legislation of to-day seems to be based upon the proposition of free raw materials. Free raw materials would involve such partiality as would seem to me not to commend the policy to anyone. The doctrine of free raw material means that the people who are responsible for the production of the finished product are to be punished for it or are not to share in the result of their labor. There can be no finished product without raw material. The raw-material men will stop work when it is no longer profitable, and what will become of the men who are engaged in the making of what is termed "the finished product"? I make that suggestion at this late hour.

Here are some interesting figures. I shall not pause to read them except where I think I should do so, because I have some tables here which I will ask leave to put in the RECORD. I have the report of the Bureau of the Census on forest products for 1909. The tables show the sawmills of the country by size and relative products. They are very interesting tables. People always think of this as a business on an enormous scale, as a big business enterprise of extraordinary immensity. I read from page 672 of the hearings before the Finance Committee:

> The total number of mills reporting for 1909 was 51,266, but the number of active mills was 48,112—

Of course, there are always a number of mills on the inactive list—> differing in that particular from the commissioner's report, which was published before the census was really completed or the Census Bureau was in condition to furnish satisfactory figures. Of these, 42,041 were classified by quantity of output.

> These tables show that 45.1 per cent of the total output of 1909 was produced by mills each cutting less than 5,000,000 feet annually—

I may say those are pretty small mills, and we are speaking of a very small item as a basis—a foot of lumber, which is a piece of board 12 inches square and an inch thick—so that 5,000,000 feet of lumber is a very small quantity of lumber, and it is a small mill that manufactures it, and yet 45 per cent of the lumber produced was cut by those small mills, while 57 per cent was by mills cutting less than 10,000,000 feet.

These are also in the class of small mills. The remainder was cut by mills with a capacity of more than 10,000,000 feet.

There is a peculiar condition connected with that. Half the lumber product of the United States is from mills of the class stated, and they do not ordinarily possess any timber reserves at all. The owners of mills having an output of 5,000,000 feet and 10,000,000 feet are not the owners of timberlands. They depend upon the market; they buy logs of the men who are clearing up their homes; they buy them of men who own timberlands and sell the logs in stumpage.

They are not the land grabbers that are sometimes so vividly pictured. We hear these timberlands spoken of as being of such great value. Now, 20,000 feet is the minimum of standard timberlands. While sometimes it runs up to 100,000 feet or more, about 50,000 feet of lumber per acre of land is the average. Fifty thousand feet of lumber is not worth over, we will say, $75 or $80. You might imagine sometimes when you hear about the timberlands being stolen that they were carried away in ore sacks, but an ordinary tract of land does not contain a fortune.

I do not desire to minimize the value of the lands. I merely want the facts to be known to those who ought to know them. I know of timberlands in our State that run up over 100,000 feet, but they are very exceptional lands, upon which the timber has not been destroyed or burned, and nothing has happened to them. They have gone on growing until the trees have attained fine proportions.

Now, about the crown lands in Canada. The crown lands in Canada are the public lands, the same as ours. They are taken up under the public-land laws or leased or disposed of just as Canada may see fit to dispose of them. The rights she has given her subordinate governments are subject always to cancellation.

I desire at this point to put in the RECORD a statement from Mr. Bronson in response to a question by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] before the Committee on Finance. It is a statement of statistics and figures that I will ask to have inserted and that I need not read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Senator SIMMONS. It does not apply to rough lumber; there is no restriction as to that?

Mr. BRONSON. None whatever. The requirement simply is that the rough material as it first comes from the woods, from the tree, shall be manufactured in the Dominion, sometimes in the Province, and that is true as to every Province with the exception of those that I have mentioned. The President, in his optimistic introduction to this agreement, says: "Free lumber we ought to have." That is a dogmatic statement which of course we dispute. "By giving our people access to the Canadian forests we shall reduce the consumption of our own, which, in the hands of comparatively few owners, now have a value that requires the enlargement of our available timber resources." That expression, however, "by giving the people access to the Canadian forests," is what I particularly wanted to mention and call your attention to. This reciprocity bill does not give our people access to the Canadian forests, nor to Canadian logs, which are produced at a cost exceeding the value of the standing timber; that is, the log is worth more than double the timber standing, of the ordinary timber, not white pine. Neither does it give access to the logs, but only to the product of the sawmill itself—that is, to an article, to a commodity two stages removed from the raw material.

Two manufacturing operations have been performed upon the tree; it has been felled, cut into logs, and brought to the market—it may be the mill—then it is put through the mill. Canada does nothing on that point for us, for the American people. Now, I am talking as a citizen, in a way, for it is no advantage to the American lumber industry that the logs should be brought across the border to accentuate the domestic competition already existing, for the North competes with the South and the East with the West, and the southerner would have a right to complain, perhaps. He certainly would not be benefited if a few northern operators were permitted by this pact to bring logs across the border, the cheap logs from the cheap Canadian timber, and cut it in the northern mills to further compete with the southern mill, but as a citizen I want to call your attention to it as the important one in this pact and treaty. It is of significance to the American people.

It indicates something of the character of this—the carelessness with which this treaty was framed. We admit Canadian lumber, a product of the sawmill, upon which perhaps $8 a thousand has been expended in the way of labor and supplies, and on top of the $2, $3, or $4, or whatever it is, stumpage value, standing value, give that free access to our markets, but do not require Canada to give us any advantage whatever. She does not release her forest; she gives us no access to her forests, but just to her sawmills. It seems to me very strange that the representatives of the United States Government who negotiated this treaty did not cover that point.

Senator SIMMONS. Let me see if I understand you. You say that before this product of the forest can be admitted free into this country under this treaty that there must be expended on it about $8 a thousand in labor?

Mr. BRONSON. Labor, supplies, and so forth, as a manufacturing process—two manufacturing processes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I submit, likewise, a statement of Mr. Bronson before the Committee on Finance, to be found on pages 737 and 738.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted to print without reading.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. BRONSON. * * * Canada charges import duty on the dressed lumber of 25 per cent ad valorem, which is dressed on more than one side, and almost all the lumber commercially is dressed on more than one side—if only one side, that is to save the freight——

Senator SIMMONS. I thought it was 25 per cent.

Mr. BRONSON. Twenty-five per cent ad valorem; yes, sir. Our duty on dressing amounts to, transferred from the specific to the ad valorem, 6¼ per cent on the importations, of the last fiscal year, one-fourth of theirs. The result of this will be that not only will Canadian lumber be manufactured by Canadian mills absolutely, but it will be dressed in Canadian planing mills; whereas our lumber will have to go into Canada rough, to be dressed there. They will do the dressing of the entire country—for both countries, so far as the trade between the two countries is concerned. No doubt this particular point is of particular importance to the hardwood manufacturers who make hardwood flooring. We shipped during the last fiscal year——

Senator SIMMONS. What is the Canadian duty on rough lumber?

Mr. BRONSON. Nothing.

Senator SIMMONS. Then it is free?

Mr. BRONSON. It is free and always has been free.

Senator SIMMONS. Unfinished?

Mr. BRONSON. Unfinished. This compels the manufacture of our rough lumber in Canada, whereas this reciprocity agreement gives a chance to change that condition, and we insist that an important amendment, an absolutely necessary amendment, so far as the lumber business is concerned, is to put the planing-mill duties of the two countries on an equality. It would be greatly to the advantage of our people and no unjust disadvantage to them. That carries the further fact that if you control the dressing of lumber you control the sale of it very largely, and the Canadian manufacturer who has an opportunity to sell in this country will be in a position to say, "We will not sell you the rough lumber, unless you will buy your dressed lumber and your sash and doors and other things of us."

It is going to put a club into the hands of the Canadian manufacturer which will hit the trade and affect the consumer all along the border. I want to say, too, along another line: The question was asked here, "Do we want any duties on lumber, so long as we export to Canada?" This was mentioned yesterday. It is shown by the average prices. The average price of the lumber that we import from Canada is eighteen or nineteen dollars a thousand. The average price of lumber exported to Canada is $28. We ship them hardwoods—50,000,000 feet or more, 50,000,000 to 75,000,000 feet of long-leaf pine, pitch pine, to the lower (eastern) Provinces—for they have nothing there to serve the same purpose. They have their fir in the Pacific country, but that has a 75-cent freight rate, whereas they can ship our pine around by all-water to Lake Superior, which has been done. It is a matter of transportation. Then there is another place where we sell lumber—in the northwest Provinces. They have developed so fast that their facilities are insufficient—important facilities—and it is too far to ship from the eastern Provinces, Ontario and Quebec, so they buy in the United States, and we buy from their section and exchange at that particular place. The west coast faces the most serious proposition anywhere.

The Atlantic coast enters with a comparatively low grade of pine, what is called "North Carolina pine," "old field pine," timber which produces on the average low-grade lumber, which competes directly with the spruces of Quebec, New Brunswick, etc.; but that competition is accentuated if this duty is taken off by the lower freight rates—water rates—coming from Canada, a difference usually of from 50 to 75 cents a thousand feet for the same distances—from Canada as from the United States, owing to our coastwise laws. We can use only American vessels between American ports. Canada can ship to our ports in vessels of any nation, and you are all aware that the foreign shipping has an advantage over us, so much so that it has driven us off the sea. This disadvantage is accentuated on the Pacific coast.

On the Pacific coast the cost of transportation from Seattle or Portland or Tacoma to San Francisco at present is $4 a thousand feet. To San Diego or San Pedro, $4.50. It is uniformly, under normal conditions when there is no special spurt of business, a dollar a thousand less from Vancouver, the same distance as Seattle and through the same channels. It is nothing but the tariff that has saved that tremendous market of San Francisco to our own producers on the coast. California consumes—of lumber from outside of the State—over a billion feet a year, coming from the north, and the advantage, owing to our coastwise laws, to the British Columbia manufacturers is such that they can capture that business with the duty removed just as fast as they can build mills to take care of it. The lumber duty is a somewhat permanent thing. They have not sought to go out for that business, business which they could not get as against the present duty, particularly as they have been busily engaged in taking care of their own trade in the northwestern Provinces—Alberta and Saskatchewan—but you take this duty off and immediately they will have the incentive to build their mills.

They are better equipped with immediately available timber than we are; that is, the country has not been so long developed. We have cut trees away from Puget Sound shores. It is a costly logging proposition, a railroad logging proposition. We have to go back to the timber; but still, in British Columbia, along the Straits of Georgia and channels, there is an enormous amount of timber, easily and cheaply available, so that in addition to their lower valuation of timber as shown by their forestry commission, which made its report last December, there is this possibility of rapidly increasing their production to take our trade, and when the Panama Canal is opened, instead of our manufacturers profiting by that canal, if the tolls are equal and the duty is off, the British Columbia and the Mexican mills can, with their shipping advantage, capture our Atlantic coast trade in lumber, regardless of anything else. We hold that this treaty recognizes in no way the lumber industry and that it failed to do in behalf of the people what it should have done. It ignored conservation.

You call to the stand any forester of standing in the United States and he will tell you that to lower the price of lumber, particularly the low grades, is to defeat or deter conservation. Conservation is a question of using up the low grades or poorest trees and so extending the life of the industry. The effect of our specific duty is protective of the low grades. We already make more low-grade stuff than we can use, and you invite more of it from Canada, and then you can not sell what you produce. You leave it in the woods and can not put money into it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I find I have covered most of my memorandum.

We use in the United States 45,000,000,000 feet of lumber annually, and we get 1,000,000 feet from Canada. Were we to substitute Canadian lumber for our product entirely we would exhaust it in five years. When I say we would exhaust it in five years, it means that we would exhaust all that would be available to railroad or transportation or that could probably be made available.

Mr. President, I desire to insert a table at this point, furnished by Mr. Bronson, who is beyond all question one of the best-advised men engaged in the business in the United States. The committee asked him to give certain facts which would crystallize the testimony, and he furnished the committee with this table. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be inserted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. BRONSON. * * * In closing, in connection with the cost of yellow pine, I would like to have printed the table from which I read the footings.

THINKS $5 LOW ENOUGH STUMPAGE CHARGE.

It will be noted from the following communication that the cost of logging operations and the price at which stumpage is charged are recognized as two important elements in manufacturing costs that vary among different mill men. This correspondent, even though he has been charging stumpage at $4, admits that $5 probably would be nearer right:

"Comparing with our own costs and figuring in interest on plant and depreciation on the same basis as given in the figures shown in your article, I find that our costs are only about $1 lower than those in the table shown by you. This is practically all accounted for in the difference in cost of logging operations. The 'diversity of physical conditions' would account for this difference in the cost of the plant shown by you and our own. We have been charging our stumpage at $4, but there is no question but what, if properly figured to cover the number of years of operations with taxes and other expenses incidental to the carrying of timber holdings, a $5 stumpage charge would be nearer right."

The next two tables shown are for November, 1910, and January, 1911, respectively. They are accompanied by the statement that the item of general expense includes interest, discount, taxes, office expense, selling, etc.:

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have a statement by Mr. John McMasters in regard to shingles. That is one of the most important items here, because the bill proposes to cut the duty from 50 to 30 cents a thousand on shingles. It does not propose that they shall be free, but it cuts it from 50 to 30 cents. It cuts the duty on laths to 10 cents per thousand.

The shingle industry represents a very large wage account. Mr. McMasters says 21 years ago the raw material for cedar shingles cost about 50 cents a thousand. To-day it costs about $1 a thousand. Twenty-one years ago the labor cost about one-third less than it does now. He says they make and put shingles on board the cars for $1.50. Last year you could buy 1,000 shingles for 2 dozen eggs; to-day you can buy 2,000 shingles for a sack of potatoes. This shows the purchasing power of the farmer's products when it comes to buying shingles. There are 500 shingle mills in the northwestern land, which employ 15,000 men, and they are paid an average of $3.50 a day. That makes a wage item alone of $52,500 a day. The State of Washington supplies between 60 and 70 per cent of all the shingles made in the United States. I want to place Mr. McMasters's statement giving shingle statistics in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SHINGLE STATISTICS.

There are in the State of Washington—

44	combination mills with total combined capacity shingles per day	8,800,000
383	straight mills with total capacity shingles per day	42,130,000
427	Total mills manufacturing shingles, total capacity per day	50,930,000

Figuring on a possible run of 280 days in a year, the total yearly capacity of all mills would be 14,260,400,000 shingles.

Combination mills are those run in connection with sawmills.

This represents an investment, regardless of timber land, etc., of about $10,000,000.

Approximately 14,000 men employed in the industry at an average daily wage of $3.50, which makes a daily pay roll of $42,000, or $252,000 a week.

Raw material costs, per 1,000 shingles	$1.00
Labor costs, per 1,000 A shingles	.45
Overhead (insurance, taxes, interest, etc.)	.15
Cost f. o. b. cars	1.60

Shingles are selling to-day for $1.45 per thousand.

The following table, prepared by Mr. J. H. Bloedel, of Bellingham, Wash., from reports of Bureau of Statistics, will show the increase in importations during years given. Note as importations increase output from Washington mills decrease.

Years.	Number of shingles.	Equivalent in car capacity.
1896	None shown.	Free.
1897	None shown.	Do.
1898	1,263,000	About 6 cars.
1899	88,000	About ½ car.
1900	1,060,000	About 5 cars.
1901	5,558,000	About 27 cars.
1902	25,008,000	About 120 cars.
1903	56,188,000	About 180 cars.
1904	175,655,000	About 878 cars.
1905	205,369,000	About 1,027 cars.
1906	256,644,000	About 1,283 cars.
1907	212,351,000	About 1,061 cars.
1908	263,054,000	About 1,315 cars.

And in proportion to this increase in importation there has been a falling off in production of shingles in the State of Washington since 1905, as will be shown by the following figures:

Years.	Number of shingles.	Figured in carloads.	Per cent of idle time.
1905	10,450,000,000	52,250	19.6
1906	7,286,600,000	36,433	50.0
1907	6,886,542,000	34,443	54.0
1908	7,288,361,000	36,441	49.0
1909	8,879,467,000	44,397	[1] 40.0
1910	[2] 8,677,450,000	43,387	[1] 40.0

JOHN MCMASTER.

Mr. HEYBURN. Cedar shingles will last fully 100 years. Cedar lands are as plentiful in Canada as they are in this country. How important it is to maintain and sustain an industry like that in our country. I saw a shingle yard in Atlantic City, I think it was, with an advertisement up, "Cedar shingles from the State of Washington." They go into every part of the country. A shingle that will last a hundred years, as those shingles will, is an item of important consideration.

There is no Shingle Trust. No one contends that there is a Shingle Trust. There are 500 mills, and they sell in their own markets, have their own agencies, and they are free from any such imputation.

I will place in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate, the statement of Mr. McMaster.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. MCMASTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it seems to me that the committee knows less of the industry that I represent than any other. There is less said about it. We are located in the State of Washington, and our great industry is a new one, a young industry. Everyone seems to agree on one thing connected with the tariff, and that is that a young industry should be protected. We are now 21 years old. Twenty-one years ago this summer the first shingles were made in the State of Washington to ship to the Middle States.

We manufactured shingles 21 years ago in a small way, and for 10 years business kept growing. For the last few years, especially the last two or three years, it seems to be at a standstill. We seem to have reached the limit of production. Twenty-one years ago this summer we received $1.65 f. o. b. the mill. We are getting to-day $1.45 and $1.50 for a better grade of shingle f. o. b. the mill, so you can see that in the 21 years the price has been getting lower all the time. Twenty-one years ago the raw material cost about 50 cents per 1,000. To-day the raw material at the mill costs about $1 per 1,000. Twenty-one years ago labor cost about one-third less, so you wonder how we exist, how we manage to make shingles and put them on board the cars for $1.50.

We make several grades, but one grade will be sufficient to give you an idea of what we are doing. Shingles are the cheapest articles made of forest products. The lumber is cheap, particularly for the lower grades; but I think of all the articles manufactured of forest products shingles are the cheapest. To illustrate, last winter you could buy 1,000 shingles for 2 dozen of eggs; to-day you can buy 2,000 shingles for a sack of potatoes. From that you can see the purchasing power of the farmer's products when it comes to buying shingles.

It does not seem to me that it is necessary for us to go abroad for shingles when we have an abundance of the raw material at home; when we have the mills, the equipment, and the labor, for the reason that we are making shingles out of the raw material that can be used for no other purpose. We are making shingles out of timber that will disappear right along, whether it is made into shingles or not. If it is not made into shingles, it will be burned by fire. The farmer, in clearing his land, will have to pile it up and burn it because there is no other use for it.

Senator HEYBURN. What wood do you make shingles out of?

Mr. MCMASTER. The cedar. The shingle manufacturer follows close behind the logger and takes what is left. If he does not consume that, it is destroyed; it is burned. There is no other use it can be put to.

Senator MCCUMBER. The shingles are made of cedar, are they?

Mr. MCMASTER. Yes, sir; all of cedar. On the coast we have the two, the fir and the cedar, and the cedar is not of any use for lumber.

Senator MCCUMBER. The lumberman takes the fir and leaves the cedar?

Mr. MCMASTER. If he does not take the cedar and make it into shingles, it is burned. For instance, in our country we logged a piece of ground last summer. We left a good deal behind in the shape of shingle cedar, intending to use it later, but a fire came along and swept it all up. We are making shingles out of the material that would otherwise be lost.

We need shingles. Shingles are used in every retail lumber yard in the United States. Our cedar makes beautiful shingles. There is no better wood known than red cedar for shingles. I believe I can say truthfully that no one knows exactly how long the red-cedar shingles will last on a roof, but there is no doubt but what red cedar, properly manufactured and laid on the roof, with proper nails, will last 100 years; so that for durability it has no superior.

The shingle business means a good deal to us. We depend upon it to a great extent. There are 500 shingle mills in the State of Washington, and we employ about 15,000 men, and you can see how many depend directly or indirectly upon the shingle industry. The average wages paid are about $3.50 a day. We employ all white labor. The men that used to be engaged in the manufacture of shingles in Michigan and Wisconsin when the timber ran short there emigrated to Washington, and now an army of these same men is in Washington working in the mills. The Washington industry benefits the State of Washington in a great many ways, and under present conditions, should the tariff be lowered, we feel that our industry will come to an end, or, in other words, it will be so unprofitable that a great many men now engaged in the business will have to abandon it. The mills will be deserted. Even to-day, under present conditions, at the prices we are getting for shingles, a shingle mill is not worth more than 50 cents on the dollar. You will ask why we continue to operate. It is because we hope that prices will improve. We hope that next year we will get a little more. To-day we are selling shingles for $1.50. We would be satisfied with $1.70. That little difference means profit or loss to us.

The shingle industry benefits all the men that are employed in the mills. It benefits those that are dependent upon them; it helps the settler. I think there is no other one thing that helps the settler more in that part of our State than the shingle industry. You know the cedar grows on the best land—on the bottom land, where the soil is rich. The result is that when a shingle mill starts up men come and buy land, they begin clearing, and when they cut down those trees they haul the logs or the bolts to the mill and get their money, and in that way they get a little start. They sell their meat and their eggs and find a market for anything else that they raise right at the mill. I know of men—not one, but hundreds of them—to-day that have homes, nice little homes, nicely cleared fields, and are in good easy circumstances, which all came about because they were enabled to do so by the shingle mill. That is the state of affairs all over that part of the country where shingles are being manufactured. We can manufacture shingles enough to supply the market of the whole United States. The State of Washington now supplies between 60 and 70 per cent of all the shingles consumed in the United States to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not insensible of the lateness of the hour, neither am I of the fact that I deem this question of such importance that I feel justified in imposing upon the patience of the Senate.

Col. Griggs gave most important testimony before the committee. He is one of the largest operators in that part of the country and a man whose statement can be relied upon. He gives the product of every concern and of the interests generally. I will not put that statement in, because it is covered by the statement of Mr. Bronson.

I desire to put in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, a statement, made in writing, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, signed by John McMasters, on behalf of the Pacific Coast Lumber Manufacturers' Association.

The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT IN WRITING SUBMITTED BY THE PACIFIC COAST LUMBER MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION.

SEATTLE, WASH., June 10, 1911.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE, Chairman,
And Members of Finance Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your request, I herewith hand you statistics of shingle-mill industry of the State of Washington. We hope that the same may answer your purpose, and if any further information along these lines is required, it will be cheerfully given.

The figures up to the year 1908 were prepared by Mr. J. H. Bloedel, of Bellingham, Wash. The shingle-mill industry began in the State of Washington over 20 years ago. Previous to that time we had no means of transportation and no way of getting the product to the consuming centers. We are now well supplied with railroads. We have the Canadian Pacific, Great Northern, Northern Pacific, Milwaukee, and Union Pacific; all these different lines touch the Puget Sound country. We are now in position to deliver shingles to any part of the United States. Previous to 1888 our cedar timber in this State had absolutely no value; there was no use to which it could be put. The owner of timber lands in estimating his timber holdings never figured in the cedar at all; but now that we have transportation facilities, conditions have changed. Shingle mills have been built at a very rapid rate, and the output of shingles increased very rapidly up to the year 1905, but since that time the output has decreased to some extent. You will see by the statistics that our greatest output was in 1905, reaching 52,250 carloads, or 10,450,000,000 shingles. We are using for shingles a product that would otherwise go to waste. When the fir timber is logged a great part of the cedar is broken up in the falling of those large trees, and a fire usually follows a slashing, so that there is no possible way to preserve the cedar for future use when the fir is being removed. The fir timber grows in greater quantity than cedar. Taking the State over, it will probably run 25 per cent cedar and 75 per cent fir. Our cedar grows very large; the smallest log we use for shingles will be 24 feet long and about 12 inches diameter at top end. The largest logs will run usually from 5 to 7 feet in diameter at small end, and occasionally larger; they are usually cut from 24 feet to 36 feet long, 32 feet being the standard length, so as to work up to 16 feet lumber without waste. Logs intended for shingles only are not cut any particular length; the longer logs are preferred by the mill owner, and are handled to better advantage by the logger. Shingle logs will run from 24 feet to 60 feet long in some localities.

We have a smaller growth of cedar that we use for telephone and telegraph poles; they are very straight and smooth, and nothing finer can be found anywhere for that purpose. Small cedar is used for railroad ties, but to a very limited extent; their lasting qualities are superior to other woods, but the softness of the wood seems to be an objection for that purpose. We can only use a small percentage of our cedar for lumber, probably less than 10 per cent, as only the clear part of the log can be cut into lumber, all the rougher parts of the logs that are not strictly first class being used for shingles only.

The question might be asked, Why do we not cut a larger percentage of lumber? The reason is that low-grade cedar lumber is not being used; it is very soft wood, splits rather easily, and the knots as a rule are loose and fall out. The clear lumber is very beautiful, and is used for many purposes, the largest amount being used for siding for outside of buildings. For that purpose it has no superior in any wood, and takes paint better than any other wood.

There is quite a large percentage of our shingles made from bolts. When we fall the tree we cut it up into blocks 4 feet 6 inches long, and split it up so that it can be handled to advantage, and it is hauled to the mill in that way. Also in rough, hilly parts of the country, and where streams are not sufficiently large to float logs, it is cut into bolts.

The shingle industry means much to our State; it has added materially to our population, from twelve to fifteen thousand men being engaged in the business. This number and their families depend upon the shingle industry for a livelihood. Many of our laborers have come from Michigan and Wisconsin, and other parts of the country where shingles have been made heretofore, but now they have come here to engage in the same calling. We have an abundance of cedar in this State, enough to supply the United States market for probably 100 years. We have complete logging equipments, the most modern mill plants, and we have the skilled labor, and are in a position to supply all the market requires at all times. What we particularly need is a larger market. We could easily increase the output at any time, if a market could be secured. Our statistics will show you that our mills do not run on an average of more than half time. The question then comes up, Why should we go abroad to get a supply of shingles when we are so well supplied with the raw material, complete equipments, and the highest skilled white labor?

The men employed in our industry are nearly all American citizens, and many of them are men of families, and home builders, and you will also see by our statistics that we pay them good wages. The only drawback is that mills being closed so many months in the year for the lack of markets for shingles compels labor to lose much time on that account. It is said by certain parties that we should have free trade in forest products in order that our own timber should be preserved, claiming that lumber and shingles will be cheaper to the consumer. That is certainly a mistaken idea; surely no one could expect lumber and shingles at a lower price than that which they are being sold for in this State to-day. Good common fir lumber at from $6 to $8 per thousand, and as good shingles as can be found anywhere at $1.45 per thousand, f. o. b. cars at the mill. It is certainly a low enough price, and it is absolutely impossible for the business to survive and pay living wages to labor at these prices. You can readily see that if the shingle manufacturer does not follow the logger, and take out the cedar logs with the fir, it will be a dead loss, and that unless the farmer can sell his shingle bolts to the shingle manufacturer, when clearing his land, they will have to be piled up and burned. So it is either a question of market for shingles or great waste and destruction of this beautiful wood.

Our cedar seems to be particularly adapted for roofing purposes; it is very beautiful, and its lasting qualities are equal, if not superior, to any wood we know of for that purpose.

Now, gentlemen, you can readily see why we of the Pacific coast, engaged in the shingle industry, are opposed to the reciprocity measure in its present form. In our case it is the very reverse of reciprocity. Give us reciprocity that will reciprocate. Even absolute free trade would be preferable to a low tariff.

When the American shingle buyer buys a carload of shingles in Canada, the American has the shingles and the Canadian has the money; when he buys his shingles in the United States he still has the shingles and the United States the money, and we have just that much more business, and labor is employed that much more. Eighty per cent of the money received for shingles goes to labor. The loss of the business would be serious to the labor interest.

We, as shingle manufacturers, look forward to the completion of the Panama Canal, and fully expect to send shingles by water that way to the Atlantic coast. But our shipping laws, with which you are all familiar, would give British Columbia a great advantage, and would deprive us of any benefits that we expect to receive from that great waterway.

We might inquire, who is it that wants a lower tariff on shingles, or who is anxious for reciprocity in its present form? It is not the British Columbia shingle manufacturer; he is satisfied with present conditions, and would prefer no change. They even now have a trade in certain brands of shingles in the United States for which they are willing to pay the present duty. They have an organization among themselves whereby they limit production to market requirements in Canada, and they would look with disfavor on any attempt we might make to sell shingles in the Provinces in competition with them. It is a fact well known that the dealers in the Provinces refuse to buy shingles from the American manufacturer, even at a lower price than they can buy them from the British Columbia manufacturer, grades being equal. So you can readily see that the manufacturers of British Columbia do not want present conditions disturbed.

Then, again, the consumer in the United States has never demanded a low tariff on shingles to our knowledge, neither have the dealers, and certainly the manufacturers in this State would have all to lose and nothing to gain if the bill should pass in its present form. Then the question comes up: Who wants free trade on forest products? In our judgment it is the man of wealth who wants to invest his money in Washington and British Columbia timberlands. He knows that reciprocity in its present form would greatly enhance the value of his timber holdings in British Columbia, while it would strike a death blow to our business, which is at the present time somewhat demoralized. Let me illustrate: An average shingle mill in this State has a capacity of about 200,000 shingles per day, a plant of that capacity would cost about $25,000. In order to keep such a plant supplied with timber for 10 years, the owner would need about 2,000 acres of timberlands. Should the shingle business become unprofitable, the result would be the mill would have to close, the men be out of employment. Such a plant employs about 50 men, 20 in the woods and 30 in the mill. The majority of shingle manufacturers have financial obligations that are always maturing. Should operations cease, his creditors would at once demand payment, the plant that cost $25,000 would not be worth one dollar. He could not put it up as security in any case, his only available asset would be his standing timber, and as he would be required to realize promptly, the result would be that he would have to sell his timberlands at a sacrifice. The man of wealth and timber speculator would have another opportunity to add to his already large holdings, and certainly at a very low price. The man of wealth and timber speculator never buys timber at a high price; he buys for 50 cents per thousand and sells at $3 per thousand.

Now, it can be readily seen that the effect of low tariff on shingles would result in making the poor man poorer and the rich man richer. These are absolute facts, and have happened before in this State, which can be abundantly proven.

We who are in the business can look back to the time when we had free trade, when mills were obliged to cease operations because they were operating at a loss. We know of large tracts of as fine timber as can be found in the United States passing into the hands of rich men for trifling sums, and which for the last years have been sold to the operators at $3 per thousand. These are facts that can not be disputed. We are not opposed to the man of wealth who wishes to invest his money in timberlands, the man who holds a large body of timber for future use, protects it from fire, and pays taxes; he might be called the friend of conservation; but we feel that the shingle manufacturers of this State or any other State in the country who have borne the burden in the heat of the day, who employ labor at good wages, who are adding to the prosperity of our country, who are good, loyal American citizens, should not have their interests sacrificed in order that the speculator in timberlands should get another opportunity to increase his holdings.

We feel that your committee should have all the facts, and we are satisfied that when you do, every member of the committee, and every Congressman and Senator, no matter to what party he may belong, be he Republican or Democrat, free trader or high protectionist, can not help but feel that this is not a political matter, but the conservation and preservation of this business to this country, to which it and the market it supplies justly belongs.

It pains the heart of every lumberman and lover of the forest to see these beautiful trees cut down and sold at such a financial sacrifice.

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN MCMASTER.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I want to call attention to just one thing, and I have finished. On a former occasion I directed the attention of the Senate to the fact, but I want to do it in connection with the consideration of this question, that we do not enter into Canada a preferred party. Under the terms of the Canadian bill pending before the Canadian Parliament we are given the right to enter their market without any exclusive privilege, but only on the same terms as other countries. That is expressly stated in the resolution now pending before the Canadian Parliament. Is it worth while to sacrifice our interests and the interests of our people in order to attend a mass meeting of the producing countries of the earth in Canada? That is all it amounts to. We are not to go there as the invited and exclusive guests, but we are simply invited to be present at a mass meeting where the rights of all countries will be equal.

Mr. President, I regret that this question must go to final consideration here and wherever the voice of the Senate may reach with so meager a presentation of it; the time has been so constantly bespoken and occupied, and to good purpose. I have no criticism to make as to the manner in which the time has been occupied. But the time has been short, and it has now practically expired when this question may be given consideration. I ask in closing, Is there no distinct advantage to be given to an American citizen in an American market, because of the fact that it is his market and of the fact that he is an American citizen? Is there no advantage to be given him under the laws, which are his laws and which laws he supports with his loyalty and his citizenship?

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 7 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 21, 1911, at 11 o'clock a. m.
